Campus groups offer students a break

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Just as we were beginning to enjoy some rainless summer weather, September and the start of another school year are upon us.

Returning students know the drill, but freshmen should understand that there is more to the university experience than classes and homework.

Jewish student groups – social, political and others – can be found on university and college campuses from coast to coast.

Here are just a few:

Hillel, which has a presence at most major universities and colleges, is a group that aims to provide students of all denominations with Jewish-themed activities, social, educational and religious. Hillel also offers volunteer and travel opportunities, through Tzedek Hillel, most with a tikkun olam (repairing the world) theme.

Hillel acts as an umbrella organization for groups and committees including the arts and culture committee, the Holocaust education committee, the Israel advocacy committee, the Jewish film group and more. For more information or to find the Hillel nearest you, visit www.hillel.org.

Also operating under the Hillel umbrella is Kulanu Toronto, a Jewish Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgendered Queer (LGBTQ) social group. Officially founded in 2003, Kulanu is designed for, but not exclusive to, the student community in the Greater Toronto Area. It offers events for the LGBTQ community such as kosher Shabbat dinners, kosher barbeques, karaoke nights, movie nights, and pub nights. For more information, check out www.kulanutoronto.ca.

If you've ever wanted to combine a passion for performing with fundraising, University of Toronto's Jewish a cappella choir, Varsity Jews, offers a mix of the two interests.

The Varsity Jews (www.varsityjews.com), which is also affiliated with Hillel, sing traditional Hebrew folk songs, as well as classic rock parodies "with an added Jewish flavour."

They've raised thousands of dollars for Jewish and Israeli humanitarian groups by selling tickets to their performances.

For York University students, there is another Jewish a cappella group called Kol Neshama.

Adding a political aspect to Jewish student life, Betar Canada (www.betar.ca) is a Zionist student organization based on the ideals and philosophy of Ze'ev Jabotinsky, a pioneer of the Zionist movement. Betar promotes Israel's right to exist in peace and security and actively holds events to counter anti-Israel sentiments on campus.

Hasbara Fellowships at York has a similar mission, which is to advocate for Israel and educate students and staff about Israeli society and politics. The student-led organization works to promote peaceful dialogue and tolerance. Check out the website at www.hasbara.ca.

Also at York is a group called Shalom-Salam (www.yorku.ca/ssy) that was formed "to create, facilitate and promote an atmosphere of mutual respect and tolerance as well as peaceful coexistence between pro-Israeli and pro-Palestinian students within the York community."

Chabad, which now has a presence at about 15 universities and colleges in Alberta, British Columbia, Nova Scotia, Ontario and Quebec, works to "strengthen the Jewish community on campus by promoting Jewish pride, study and celebration for students, regardless of background or affiliation. Chabad educates and empowers students to engage Judaism in a meaningful way and to live Judaism joyfully." To find a Chabad House at or near your campus, visit www.chabad.edu.

Students looking for a Reform group on campus can turn to Kesher, an affiliate of the Union for Reform Judaism, "that connects college-aged Reform Jews... in order to promote continuous involvement in Reform Judaism." Visit http://keshercollege.org for a list of schools.

Koach, a group that reaches out to the Conservative community on campus, helps students maintain their connection to Conservative Judaism by promoting Torah study, Israel and God through social, religious, educational, cultural and social action programs. Visit www.koach.org to search for campus contacts.

For those interested in a more mystical approach to Judaism, Jacob Kessler at kabbalahclub@hotmail.com heads the Kabbalah Club and develops programs to "disseminate the wisdom of Kabbalah" to people of all backgrounds and faiths to meet, study, discuss and socialize.

Students who are looking for extra-curricular programs that focus on social action can turn to Students Taking Action Now: Darfur (STAND). Although it is not a Jewish organization per se, STAND embodies Jewish values and principles of tikkun olam, and as a result many STAND activists are Jewish.

With college and university chapters all over the country, STAND is an organization that works to create awareness among students and the media about the ongoing genocide in the Darfur region of Sudan, and to push the government to take action.

The Canadian Jewish Law Students' Association, founded in 1987, is available to Jewish law school students all over the country. Each year, the CJLSA holds a national conference that attracts prominent lawyers and judges and gives law students the opportunity to network with their peers. Contact cjlsa2007@gmail.com for more information.

It's hard to think of fraternities and sororities without thinking of partying, drinking and hazing, but members of Jewish fraternities Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEPi) and Delta Pi are students dedicated to building social relationships and helping those in need.

While universities may be reluctant to recognize these groups on campus, there is no denying their presence. AEPi brothers (www.aepi.org) often hold fundraisers for Jewish causes, as well as blood and bone marrow drives, whereas their Delta Pi sisters (www.deltapisorority.ca), based at York University, are also dedicated to raising money for causes such as breast cancer.

Israeli tourism program seeks students

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Israel School of Tourism in Haifa is looking to attract Canadian students for a new program that is designed solely for the Diaspora population.

The new program, called Israel Tour and Travel Experts (ITTE), is a six-month program sponsored by MASA and the Jewish Agency to improve on Israel's tourism industry while bringing the Diaspora community closer to Israel.

"There is a saying in Hebrew that I will try to translate: 'All Israel is responsible for one another,'" said Chen Yaari, the ITTE co-ordinator for the Israel School of Tourism in Haifa.

"The practical meaning of this saying, as we see it, is to bring Israel to the Diaspora and to bring the Diaspora to Israel. We are all together responsible for the future of Israel and the future of the Jewish people. Out of this commitment, the Israel School of Tourism is opening the ITTE course."

This is the first time the Israel School of Tourism – which was established by the Israeli Ministry of Tourism almost 50 years ago and became part of University of Haifa in 1997 – has opened a program exclusively for non-Israelis.

"It is a program for English speakers all over the world that are not citizens of Israel but wish to get to know Israel as if they were its citizens," Yaari said.

"The purpose of the program is to gain a deep understanding of Israel, its history, views, and people, while strengthening their Hebrew language skills" through a Hebrew Ulpan program, she added.

"For this reason, the students of this program will be studying about Israel, in Israel."

Students will learn about Israel's geography, the diversity of its people, its history, archeology, flora and fauna, art, architecture, economy, government and more.

Program to feature learning tours in cities around Israel

The program, which is set to begin in January, will take students out of the classroom for dozens of intensive one-day learning tours in cities and areas all over the country, including Jerusalem, the Galilee, the Negev, Tel Aviv and the Golan Heights.

The program costs $14,000 for tuition as well as living accommodations, which are provided in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Haifa and Be'er Sheva, depending on the programming and tour itineraries.

Students will also be exposed to Israeli culture through meetings with prominent members of Israeli society, as well as outings to the theatre and the cinema.

"In this way they will also take part in the important Zionist worldwide mission," Yaari said.

She added that although the program isn't exclusive to North Americans, she has focused much of her recruiting efforts here.

"The ITTE program is not focusing only on the North American students, but since there is a wide Jewish and Zionist community there, the Israel School of Tourism puts a lot of effort into encouraging this community to strengthen its relations with Israel and take an active part in the Zionist worldwide mission."

Yaari said that at this point, the program isn't designed as an exchange program, but graduates of the ITTE program will be eligible for accreditation at the University of Haifa if they decide to continue their studies in Israel.

ITTE graduates will receive a diploma from the Israel School of Tourism that will open the door to a variety of career choices. They can choose to participate in a guide course that will enable them to become licensed tour guides in Israel by the Ministry of Tourism.

She added that there is also a chance that the courses taken in the ITTE program can to be transferred to a program in Canada, depending on the school and the program.

Candidates for the ITTE program should be English speakers and have an affinity with Judaism and the land of Israel. To apply, visit www.tayarut-school.co.il.

Governor's resume thin on Jewish issues

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

ST. PAUL, Minn. — A small Israeli flag propped up on a window frame. A Pat Buchanan button sported briefly as a courtesy. A prospective son-in-law with a biblical name.

Little about the Frozen North is Jewish outside the realm of fiction, so when Republicans pitch Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin, John McCain's vice-presidential pick, to the Jews and Democrats try to undermine her, both sides tend to grasp at straws.

Picking through the trivia and smears for substance, there's this: Palin, 44, has genuinely warm relations with her Jewish constituents – 6,000 or so – and appears to have a fondness for Israel. She also comes down on the strongly conservative side on social issues, while Jews tend to trend liberal.

"Gov. Palin has established a great relationship with the Jewish community over the years and has attended several of our Jewish cultural gala events," Rabbi Yosef Greenberg, the director of Chabad-Lubavitch in Anchorage, wrote in an e-mail after McCain announced that she was joining his ticket.

"Gov. Palin also had plans to visit Israel with members of the Jewish community, however, for technical reasons, the visit has not occurred yet."

Sarah Palin

Palin is likable enough and got support from Ethan Berkowitz, the Jewish former minority leader in the Alaska House of Representatives, who appears poised to become the first Democrat to represent Alaska in the U.S. House of Representatives since Nick Begich disappeared in a snowstorm in 1972 during a flight from Anchorage to Juneau.

"I like her and this is an exciting day for Alaska," Berkowitz said.

Republicans have been scouring the archives to uncover evidence of Palin's outreach to Jews and to Israel.

Her single substantive act is signing a resolution in June marking 60 years of Alaska-Israel relations, launched improbably in 1948 when Alaska Airlines helped shepherd thousands of Yemenite Jews to Israel. However, she did not initiate the legislation: its major mover was John Harris, the speaker of the Alaska House.

The paucity of material led the Republican Jewish Coalition (RJC) to tout the appearance of a small Israeli flag propped against a window of the state capitol in an online video in which Palin touts the virtues of hiking in Juneau.

In an e-mail blast, RJC executive director Matt Brooks offered the flag as an answer for "those of you who have had questions regarding Sarah Palin and her views on Israel."

In a seemingly equal bit of stretching in the other direction, some Democrats played up an Associated Press report that Palin – then the mayor of the small Alaska town of Wasilla – had sported a Buchanan button in 1999 when the Reform Party candidate visited there.

"John McCain's decision to select a vice-presidential running mate that endorsed Pat Buchanan for president in 2000 is a direct affront to all Jewish Americans," said a recent e-mail blast from the campaign of Democratic presidential nominee Barack Obama, quoting U.S. Democratic Congressman Robert Wexler, Obama's top Jewish surrogate.

"Pat Buchanan is a Nazi sympathizer with a uniquely atrocious record on Israel, even going as far as to denounce bringing former Nazi soldiers to justice and praising Adolf Hitler for his 'great courage,'" Wexler said.

The problem was that Palin had corrected the record as soon as the AP report appeared, noting in a letter to a local newspaper, which had published the account, that she wore the button as a courtesy. In fact, in the 2000 election, during the GOP primaries, she was an official of the Steve Forbes presidential campaign.

The hunger for Palin-Jewish news extended beyond partisan politics. Pulses quickened among some in the Israeli media when the McCain campaign revealed last week that Palin's 17-year-old unmarried daughter, Bristol, is pregnant and that her fiance's name is Levi. (It was revealed later that his last name is Johnston, so no seders in the immediate Palin family future.)

The National Jewish Democratic Council (NJDC) focused on a more substantive difference between Palin and the U.S. Jewish community: her staunch social conservatism.

"For a party which claims it is trying to reach out to the Jewish community, McCain's pick is particularly strange," NJDC director Ira Forman said in a statement. "On a broad range of issues, most strikingly on the issue of women's reproductive freedom, she is totally out of step with Jewish public opinion. The gulf between Palin's public policy positions and the American Jewish community is best illustrated by the fact that the Christian Coalition of America was one of the strongest advocates of her selection."

Palin backs abortion only in cases where a woman's life is at risk, opposes stem cell research and believes creationism should be taught in schools alongside evolution.

Perhaps the most damning feature of her resumé on Jewish issues is its thinness – her broader problem as well. Berkowitz, the Jewish congressional candidate, poked a little fun at the resumé by citing Palin's enthusiasm for guns and hunting.

"As far as Republican vice-presidents go, she will be a much better shot than Dick Cheney," he said. "But this is John McCain's choice and an insight in terms of his judgment."

Ben Chouake, who heads NORPAC, a New Jersey-based pro-Israel political action committee and one who is close to the McCain campaign, says he learned that McCain favoured Senator Joe Lieberman the one-time Democrat and Al Gore's vice-presidential pick in 2000 – a Conneticut independent – until the last minute but caved to arguments that Lieberman would alienate the Republican party's conservative base.

"I don't know anything about her, but I'm not concerned because she is the governor, who is someone with executive experience," Chouake told JTA.

Palin has served less than two years as governor and, as NJDC noted, has "zero foreign policy experience."

Rabbi Greenberg, of Chabad, who has not endorsed a candidate, suggested that she makes up in soul what she lacks in experience, referring to her fifth child, Trig, a Down syndrome baby born just four months ago.

"I was personally impressed by Gov. Palin's remarks of hope and faith when she gave birth to a child with special needs," he said. "We all feel that the governor is a remarkable, energetic and good person."

JTA staff writer Jacob Berkman contributed to this report from New York.

Biden, Palin campaigns clash on Middle East

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

ST. PAUL, Minn. — The two vice-presidential candidates led the way last Wednesday as the Obama and McCain campaigns worked to draw clear battle lines on Iran and Israel.

In a highly anticipated speech at the Republican National Convention, Alaska governor and vice-presidential nominee Sarah Palin mocked Democratic presidential candidate Senator Barack Obama for saying more than a year ago that as president he would meet the leaders of pariah states unconditionally.

John McCain and Sarah Palin

"Terrorist states are seeking nuclear weapons without delay – he wants to meet them without preconditions," she said during her acceptance speech at the Xcel Energy Center here.

Palin's address followed a speech by former New York mayor Rudolph Giuliani, the most popular candidate among Jewish GOPers in the primaries. Giuliani warmed up the crowd with swipes at Obama, including an assertion that the Democratic nominee had flip-flopped on the issue of Jerusalem.

"When speaking to a pro-Israeli group, Obama favoured an undivided Jerusalem, like I favour and John McCain favours it," Giuliani said. "Well, he favoured an undivided Jerusalem – don't get excited – until one day later when he changed his mind."

Earlier in the day, the Democrats launched their own Middle East-related attack when Obama's running mate, Senator Joe Biden, used a 20-minute conference call with members of the Jewish media to blast the Bush administration and McCain, the Republican presidential nominee and longtime Arizona senator.

Barack Obama and Joe Biden

Biden blamed the Bush administration's sluggish diplomatic efforts for slowing up Israeli-Palestinian talks and paving the way for the ascendancy of Iran and its proxies, Hamas and Hezbollah. The Democratic vice-presidential candidate argued that the administration has failed to respect Israel's autonomy, citing reports that the White House at one time directed Israel not to engage in talks with Syria. And he appeared to reject the administration's reported efforts to block Israel from taking military action against Iran.

"This is not a question for us to tell the Israelis what they can and cannot do," Biden said. "I have faith in the democracy of Israel. They will arrive at the right decision that they view as being in their own interests."

That said, Biden added, the Bush administration could have done much more on the diplomatic front to help avert the potential need for military action.

Taken together, Biden's press call and the GOP convention speeches underscored the ramped-up efforts by both campaigns to paint the other side as promoting a reckless foreign policy that would endanger Israel and undermine U.S. interests.

They come as polls suggest that Obama commands about 60 percent of the Jewish vote – a solid majority, but at least 15 points below the percentages recorded by recent Democratic presidential candidates.

Even as both sides attempted to draw stark distinctions on the Israeli-Palestinian crisis, it was unclear if any exist. The clearest gap appears to be on moving the U.S. Embassy in Israel to Jerusalem.

McCain has said he would do so when he enters office. In response, the Obama campaign accused McCain of lying.

The last two presidents made the same promise during their campaigns, but neither George W. Bush nor Bill Clinton over the past 16 years ever even made an attempt to actually carry out that promise.

McCain, Obama favour two-state solution

On the wider question of Jerusalem's final status, however, it's not clear that the candidates disagree.

Obama felt the need to clarify comments he made on the issue to thousands of pro-Israel activists in June, but both he and McCain have expressed essentially the same views: They share Israel's concerns and say ultimately the two sides must decide the matter in negotiations.

Though for years the Bush administration was reluctant to dive into Israeli-Palestinian negotiations, McCain has pledged to do so. Both he and Obama favour a two-state solution, place most of the blame on the Palestinians for the failure to reach one, and back efforts to isolate Hamas and shore up Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

On Iran, however, the disagreements appear more pronounced – between Obama and the Bush administration and between the two presidential campaigns.

In mocking Obama's stated willingness to meet with the president of Iran, Palin was echoing a long-standing line of attack against Obama employed not only by Republicans but also by Obama's main rival in the Democratic primaries, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Since Obama first made the remark during a primary debate more than a year ago, he appears to have backtracked, saying he would require extensive preparations before such a meeting.

Still, Obama and Biden have stuck to the view that hard-nosed talks between the United States and Iran could ultimately lead Tehran to change its behaviour – and, failing that, make it easier to build international support for tougher sanctions and possible military action against the Islamic regime.

Candidates disagree on Iran

McCain, on the other hand, has scoffed at the notion that talking with top Iranian leaders would do any good. At the same time, McCain has opposed several congressional measures backed by Obama that supporters say would place increased economic pressure on Iran to abandon its nuclear pursuits.

Biden argued during the conference call that the net result of McCain's positions is that he's offering a choice between "unacceptable status quo or war."

"There's nothing in between with the McCain doctrine – nothing," Biden said. "That is no option. That is a Hobson's choice."

In her speech last week, Palin expanded the Iran debate, arguing that the energy policies she favours – in particular, expanding oil drilling in the United States, especially Alaska – would help diminish the Iranian threat.

"To confront the threat that Iran might seek to cut off nearly a fifth of world energy supplies or that terrorists might strike again at the Abqaiq facility in Saudi Arabia or that Venezuela might shut off its oil deliveries," Palin said, "we Americans need to produce more of our own oil and gas."

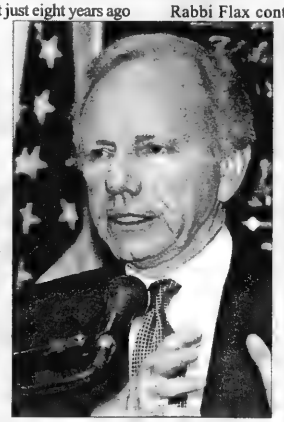
Lieberman praises McCain as a maverick

JTA Staff

ST. PAUL, Minn. — Senator Joe Lieberman, now a Conneticut independent; another Jewish senator; and a rabbi played lead roles in praising John McCain at the Republican National Convention last week.

Norm Coleman, a former mayor of St. Paul and one of only two Jewish Republicans in the Senate, welcomed delegates to the first full day of the convention at the Xcel Energy Center. And Rabbi Ira Flax, a retired air force chaplain now living in Birmingham, Ala., delivered the benediction.

But Lieberman's was the most anticipated speech, given that just eight years ago he was the Democratic party's vice-presidential candidate.



Senator Joe Lieberman

While politicians and pundits have been debating his ability to convince Jewish voters to back McCain, Lieberman's speech was aimed more generally at Democrats and independents. The same could be said of Coleman and Rabbi Flax, whose comments did not appear to be aimed specifically at Jews.

"You may not agree with John McCain on every issue," Lieberman said Tuesday, "but you can always count on him to be straight with you about where he stands and to stand for what he thinks is right for our country regardless of the politics.

"I can tell you with a certain faith that as president, you can count on John McCain to be what he is naturally – a restless reformer who will clean up Washington and get our government working again for all of the American people."

Lieberman, the first Jewish candidate on a national ticket when presidential candidate Al Gore picked him as a running mate in 2000, became an independent in 2006, after he lost in the Democratic primary in Connecticut. He continues to caucus with Senate Democrats, providing them with their ruling majority, but last year endorsed McCain.

Coleman, welcoming the GOP convention to his home state, managed to get Jews, pigs and St. Paul into the first three sentences of his speech.

"Good evening and welcome to Pig's Eye, Minn.," he said. "That's right, we were called Pig's Eye until a Catholic priest built a wooden chapel a few steps from here dedicated to St. Paul.

"Although I am a person of the Jewish faith, I often reference St. Paul. And as former mayor of this city that was named for him, I proudly welcome you to my city of St. Paul."

Coleman said that McCain was the candidate for "people who demand government reform, to folks who need jobs, to families who deserve to keep more of their own money by keeping taxes low, and to those around the world who yearn for freedom."

In his benediction, Rabbi Flax quoted the Book of Proverbs, saluted the military and endorsed McCain. He began by noting that "the song God Bless America was introduced to this country 70 years ago, and in those seven decades, Lord, you have indeed blessed us in so many ways."

Rabbi Flax continued, "We are here in this hall this evening safe and secure because there are men and women willing to serve others [and] they are standing guard against the enemies of freedom and ready to respond to the natural calamities that beset our lot from time to time. We ask you, God, to bless their efforts, bless their families, and bless us, too."

Hurricane Gustav had effectively wiped out the first scheduled day of events (Sept. 1) at the convention. Republicans urged convention-goers to give blood and money to its victims.

Rabbi Flax also paid tribute to those suffering through Gustav.

"As our fellow citizens on the Gulf Coast emerge from the dark night of storm clouds and rain, may the light of God's face shine upon them and bless them with peace," the rabbi said.

Finally, he quoted from Proverbs in both Hebrew and English.

"'B'eyn chazon yipareh am,' where there is no vision, the people perish," he said. "In every age, God, you have provided people of vision to act decisively in moments of great adversity. Bless this land with prosperity, bless our people with health and our leaders with vision, and God bless John McCain, the next president of the United States."

President George W. Bush addressed the convention by satellite from the White House, ostensibly because he had to manage hurricane response. The McCain campaign has tried to distance itself from the most unpopular president in polling history, and Bush spoke for just eight minutes.

He included a veiled reassurance to the party's base that McCain could be counted on when it comes to opposing abortion.

THROW A BAR MITZVAH—OR BUSINESS LUNCH—THAT ROCKS!

Whether it's a bar mitzvah, bat mitzvah, "Bubbie's" birthday or a business banquet, you'll always be treated like a rock star at Hard Rock Cafe Toronto and Hard Rock Cafe at The Rogers Centre (formerly the Skydome).

With a combined 27,000-square feet, including nightclubs and streetside patios, Hard Rock Cafe Toronto and Hard Rock Cafe at The Rogers Centre offer a vast array of configurations for a wide variety of events, from five to 500 people, breakfast through late-night.

Marcelo DeOliveira, sales and marketing manager for Hard Rock Cafe: "We've hosted countless bar mitzvahs, wedding receptions, product launches and press conferences. We've put on events for all types of companies, from Deloitte & Touche and The Toronto Star, to BMG Music. Guests love Hard Rock. It's a very unique environment."

As if to make his point, DeOliveira walks a visitor past some of the priceless rock memorabilia hanging on Hard Rock Cafe Toronto's walls, such as Bob Dylan's autographed guitar from the cover of a 1984 live album and a handmade mariachi suit he wore on tour. Guests will also see a pair of sketches by John Lennon, a fur-trimmed purple jacket that belonged to Prince and an outrageous pair of platform shoes from the closet of Stanley Eisen – better known as Paul Stanley of KISS – as well as a beautiful custom instrument once owned by Canadian guitar virtuoso, Alex Lifeson, of Rush.

And as a testament to the old adage, "rock 'n' roll never dies," Hard Rock Cafe at The Rogers Centre boasts dueling walls of The Rolling Stones' and The Beatles' memorabilia. So far, The Beatles are ahead with 23 pieces, including the hand-written lyrics to "Get Back." But if Brit Rock isn't your thing, you can check out some cool stuff from this side of the pond, like the guitar Jimi Hendrix used when recording "Little Wing," the jacket Buddy Holly wore on tour or Bo Diddley's guitar "Lucille." There is a tribute room to the "King" himself, where you can get a peek at Elvis's silk pajamas, among other things.

After the tour, DeOliveira explains that this is all part of the experience, that his staff will design exactly the experience a guest is looking for. "For instance, you can have a sit-down dinner or a buffet. We have great sound, great lighting and video monitors throughout the cafes. We can set up for dancing or karaoke. We can even put together really fun loot bags from our Rock Shop. Whatever you need. Because to us, you're a rock star."

Memories of a lively Rosh Hashanah dinner

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

When I was growing up, my large, boisterous family would gather in my grandparents' tiny apartment in Belle Harbor, N.Y., for the festive Rosh Hashanah meal. Papa Harry, who had emigrated from Russia in 1906 as a carpenter, would extend the dining table with boards reaching practically to the walls. The arrival of the aunties with their foil-covered dishes signalled the beginning of the holiday feast, a menu that seldom varied.

Over at the children's table, a gaggle of cousins, raised practically as siblings, chattered, spilled soup, shouted, squabbled, hiccupped with laughter, fought over drumsticks and dropped crumbs, clamoured for seconds, and ran around, as far as one could run in such tight quarters, until a withering look from one of the aunties brought a temporary attitude adjustment, and then it was back to the merriment.

Or so I'm told.

We were never there!

My parents were singers, and as I recall the Jewish holidays of my childhood, no idyllic scene of family gatherings comes to mind. My father was also a part-time cantor, and we spent Rosh Hashanah at New York's Riverside Plaza Hotel, where Dad, along with a rented rabbi, conducted his magnificent services, complete with choir (including my mom's glorious contralto) for a congregation that had lost its building in a fire and had never rebuilt.

By my late teens, my parents' holiday gig had moved to the Windsor Hotel in the "Borscht Belt," New York's Catskill Mountains. As the children of headliners Lillian and Jan Bart, my brother, Gary, and I basked in their reflected glory.

With my dad's death at age 52 in August of 1971, and our move just a few weeks later to California, where my brother and his family had already settled, the party came to a screeching halt.

Its versatility makes chicken a good choice

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

I always say one can never have too many chicken recipes. (Of course, I always also say one can never have too many brownie or chocolate chip cookie recipes either, but that's a different article!) Especially at this time of year, when entertaining straddles the fine line between the desire for new and the pull toward tradition, roast chicken becomes a delicious and easy solution to this quandary. Chicken is eminently versatile, garbing itself in new flavours as if they were always part of its regular wardrobe. To boot, roasting two chickens is as easy as roasting one, tailoring itself to fit a smaller crowd as easily as a larger gathering. The following four recipes hopefully introduce some unique tastes to your Rosh Hashanah dinner, the new accents a harbinger of all things wonderful to come in the new year.

CRANBERRY HONEY GLAZED CHICKEN

Cranberry Honey Glaze
1 1/2 cups fresh or frozen cranberries
3/4 cup honey
1/4 cup rice vinegar
2 tbsp. chopped fresh thyme

6-lb. chicken
1 large onion, peeled and cut into quarters
2 carrots, peeled and halved
3 sprigs fresh thyme
1 tbsp. olive oil
1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper

Preheat oven to 375. In saucepan, combine cranberries, honey and vinegar. Bring to a boil over high heat, reduce heat to medium and simmer for about 5 minutes or just until cranberries pop. Pour mixture into food processor; puree until smooth. Press through fine mesh sieve into bowl and stir in fresh thyme. Let glaze cool slightly.

Remove giblets and neck from chicken. Rinse and pat chicken dry inside and out. Stuff cavity with onion, carrots and thyme sprigs. Tie legs together with string and tuck wings under back.

Place chicken, breast side up, on rack in roasting pan. Rub oil all over chicken, then sprinkle with salt and pepper. Brush half of the cranberry honey glaze all over chicken. Roast in centre of preheated oven for 45 minutes. Brush remaining glaze over chicken. Roast for 45 to 60 more minutes or until juices run clear when chicken is pierced and meat thermometer inserted in thigh registers 185F.

Tent with foil for 10 minutes. Carve and serve. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

MUSTARD CRUSTED ROAST CHICKEN

1 cup Dijon mustard
2 large shallots, minced
1/4 cup minced garlic
2 tbsp. chopped fresh thyme
1 tbsp. honey
1/2 tsp. each salt and pepper
1 large chicken (about 6 lb. – or two 3-lb. chickens)
1 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil

In small bowl, stir together Dijon, shallots, garlic, thyme, honey and half of salt and pepper.

Remove giblets and neck from chicken. Rinse and pat chicken dry inside and out. Rub 1/3 of mustard paste into cavity. Tie legs together with string and tuck wings under back. Sprinkle top of chicken with remaining salt and pepper. Rub remaining paste all over outside of chicken. (Chicken can be prepared up to this point and refrigerated, covered, for up to 24 hours. Bring to room temperature for 30 minutes.)

Preheat oven to 375. Place chicken, breast side up, on rack in roasting pan. Drizzle oil over chicken. Bake in centre of preheated oven for about 2 hours or until juices run clear when chicken is pierced and meat thermometer inserted in thigh reads 185F.

Tent with foil for 10 minutes. Carve and serve. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

Try something new for Rosh Hashanah…Baked apples with a difference

Rosh Hashanah 1971 is a blurred memory. Mom had come with us, and for the first time, instead of sharing the holiday meal with hundreds of rollicking vacationers, we set a table for eight in our Tustin apartment.

All I remember is the comfort and solace of Mom's chicken soup, which through the years has become the immutable staple of every holiday meal. But for the rest of the menu, my modus operandi each year is to try new recipes from my stack of new cookbooks.

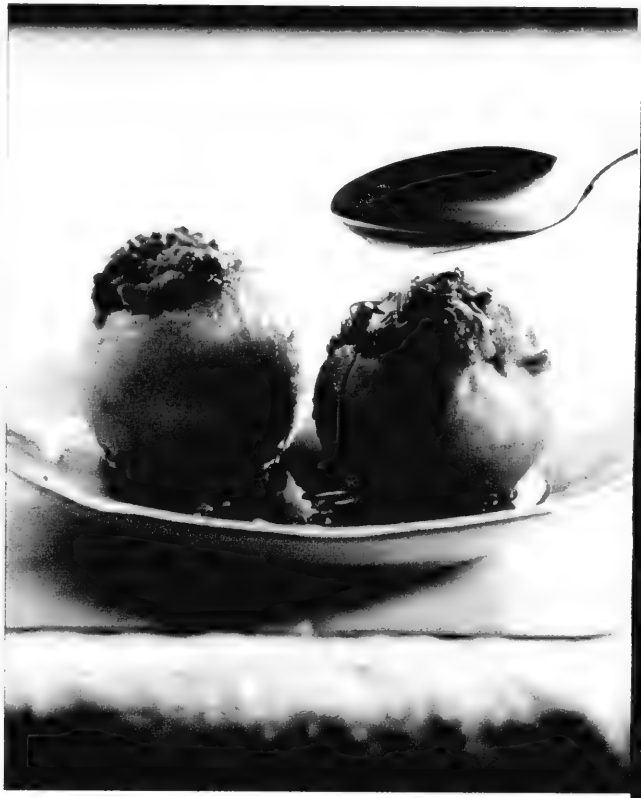
Since Rosh Hashanah celebrates the birth of the earth, I'm irresistibly drawn to Food to Live By: The Earthbound Farm Organic Cookbook (Workman) by Myra Goodman – co-founder of Earthbound Farm, the world's largest grower and purveyor of organic produce – with Linda Holland and Pamela McKinstry.

Ironically, Goodman, whose parents were Holocaust survivors, was raised on what her mother deemed "good American food," like Lucky Charms and TV dinners. "Her idea of a home-cooked meal was minute steak with Accent," she told me. "For me, living on the farm was where I really learned to cook."

This city girl became a farmer by accident when she and her husband, Drew, tended a small raspberry patch in Carmel to raise money for graduate school. "We fell in love with living off the land and growing food," she said.

Organic was a natural choice from the very beginning. "The former tenant showed us how to use the chemical pesticides," she recalled, "but we had an instinctive aversion.

"When you grow up in New York, you get food from the supermarket. You can't see, smell or taste the chemicals. But it's different when you're the one holding them and needing gloves and a mask to use on what's growing in your backyard to sell to people at your roadside stand."



For Rosh Hashanah, Goodman suggests Merlot-Braised Short Ribs with Cipollini Onions. Slowly braised until fork-tender, the beef bathes in a rich sauce of red wine, earthy mushrooms, and balsamic vinegar. Like my mother's chicken soup, the homemade beef stock becomes a building block for so many other recipes, but store-bought may be substituted.

For dessert, I've found a dish to satisfy the health conscious and indulgers alike: Streusel-Stuffed Baked Apples from Susie Fishbein's Kosher by Design Short on Time (Artscroll).

Fishbein began experimenting with baked apples for her diabetic father. "The recipe takes an apple pie and stuffs it into an apple basically," she explained. "Everybody at the table can enjoy this version, whether it's somebody's dessert in place of pie or not."

Merlot short ribs are a signature dish

Fishbein recalled with fondness Rosh Hashanahs past. "My grandmother used to bring the kreplach (meat-filled dumplings), all those bubbie things that somehow got lost and never quite made it into handwritten recipes."

Everyone contributed a signature dish. "My family would pull up, open the trunk, and there would be this sea of aluminum foil," she said. "I've become one of the sea-of-foil-bearing relatives now."

Judy Bart Kancigor is the author of Cooking Jewish: 532 Great Recipes from the Rabinowitz Family (Workman) and can be found on the web at www.cookingjewish.com.

MERLOT-BRAISED SHORT RIBS WITH CIPOLLINI ONIONS

1 oz. dried porcini mushrooms
1 cup warm water
5 lb. boneless beef short ribs, or 7 lb. bone-in beef short ribs salt and freshly ground black pepper
4 tbsp. olive oil
2 carrots, coarsely chopped
2 ribs celery, coarsely chopped
2 small yellow onions, coarsely chopped
3 cloves garlic, peeled and thinly sliced
1 bay leaf
3 tbsp. fresh thyme leaves
1/4 cup tomato paste
1 bottle (750 ml.) merlot
4 cups Slow Simmering Beef Stock (recipe follows) or store-bought low-sodium beef broth
12 oz. cipollini or pearl onions (12 to 16 onions)
1/4 cup good-quality balsamic vinegar

Soak dried mushrooms in 1 cup warm water until soft, at least 5 minutes. Drain mushrooms in a sieve set over a small bowl. Set mushrooms aside. Strain soaking liquid through a paper coffee filter, then set aside soaking liquid.

Position a rack in the lower third of the oven and preheat the oven to 350. Dry ribs with paper towels, then liberally season them with salt and pepper.

Heat 2 tbsp. of the olive oil in a large, heavy, ovenproof pot or roasting pan over medium-high heat. Working in batches if needed to avoid crowding the pot, add the ribs and brown well on all sides, 8 to 10 minutes per batch. Using tongs or a slotted spoon, transfer ribs to a platter and set aside.

Reduce heat to medium and add remaining 2 tbsp. olive oil to the pot. Add carrots, celery, yellow onions and garlic and cook, stirring occasionally, until vegetables begin to caramelize, 15 to 20 minutes.

Add bay leaf, thyme and tomato paste to the pot and cook, stirring frequently, for 5 minutes.

Return ribs and any accumulated juice to the pot, stacking them to fit, if necessary. Add soaked mushrooms, mushroom soaking liquid and merlot. Add 3 to 4 cups of the stock, enough that ribs are covered. Heat ribs over medium-high heat until liquid begins to simmer.

Cover the pot tightly with a lid or aluminum foil. Bake ribs until tender when pierced with a fork, about 3 hours. Check the pot about every 30 minutes to make sure the sauce is gently simmering but not boiling. If needed, adjust the oven temperature to maintain a slow simmer.

Meanwhile, fill a large bowl of water with ice cubes and set aside.

Bring a medium-size saucepan of water to a boil over medium-high heat. Add the onions and cook until their skins loosen, about 2 minutes. Drain onions, then plunge them into the bowl of ice water. When cool enough to handle, peel onions, cutting a small sliver off the root end and pulling the skin off. Set onions aside.

Remove ribs from sauce, place them on a platter and loosely cover them with aluminum foil to keep warm.

Let sauce rest for a few minutes until the fat rises to the surface. Degrease the sauce by skimming off the fat with a metal spoon or ladle.

Pour sauce through a strainer and discard the solids, including the bay leaf. Wash the pot and return the sauce to it. Bring the sauce to a simmer over medium heat.

Add vinegar and onions to sauce, then let it simmer gently until it is concentrated and the onions are tender, 20 to 30 minutes. Add ribs and let simmer until they are warmed through, then serve. Yield: 8 to 10 servings.

SLOW SIMMERING BEEF STOCK WITH RED WINE

10 lb. beef or veal bones, preferably with some meat attached
2 tbsp. olive oil
2 large yellow onions, unpeeled, cut into wedges
4 celery ribs with leaves, cut into 1-in. pieces
1 large carrot, unpeeled and cut into 1-in. pieces
8 cloves garlic, unpeeled
1 bottle kosher dry red wine
1 can diced tomatoes
1 tsp. whole black peppercorns

Note: To prevent harmful bacteria from developing, cool stocks quickly after cooking before refrigerating or freezing. Divide stock into small containers, or use an ice bath: transfer stock to a clean pot and place in a pan filled with ice water, stirring occasionally.

Position a rack in the lower third of the oven and preheat the oven to 450.

Place meat bones in a large roasting pan in a single layer and rub olive oil over them. (If necessary, arrange the bones in 2 pans to avoid crowding, which could slow down the browning process.)

Roast the bones until they begin to brown, about 1 hour. Add onions, celery, carrot and garlic and continue baking, stirring occasionally, until bones are deep brown, about 45 minutes.

Transfer bones and vegetables to a very large soup pot or divide them between 2 pots, if needed. Add wine to the roasting pan and scrape up any brown bits from the bottom of the pan. Pour this into the soup pot and add just enough cool water to barely cover the bones, about 12 cups.

Bring liquid just to a boil over high heat, then reduce heat to low. Using a large spoon, skim off any foam that accumulates on the surface.

Add tomatoes and peppercorns and let simmer gently, uncovered, at least 6 hours or up to 12 hours, adding more water as needed to keep the bones barely covered with liquid.

Remove and discard bones. Strain stock through a fine-meshed sieve into a large, clean pot and discard the solids. If the stock tastes weak, bring it to a simmer over medium heat and cook until reduced by a third to intensify the flavour, 30 to 45 minutes.

If you are using the stock at this time, let it rest for a few minutes so the fat rises to the surface, then skim it off with a metal spoon or ladle. If not for immediate use, let the stock come to room temperature using the quick cooling method (see note above). Refrigerate stock, covered, until fat has solidified on the surface, then discard fat. Stock can be refrigerated, covered, for up to 3 days or frozen for up to 6 months. Yield: 8 to 10 cups.

STREUSEL-STUFFED BAKED APPLES

3/4 cup all-purpose flour
3/4 cup dark brown sugar
1/2 cup old-fashioned rolled oats (not quick-cooking or 1-minute type)
6 tbsp. unsalted butter or margarine, melted
3 medium red apples, such as McIntosh or Cortland
3 medium green apples, such as Granny Smith
1 cup apple juice
1/2 cup honey
2 tsp. ground cinnamon
thick caramel (recipe below)
ice cream or whipped cream, dairy or pareve (optional)

Preheat oven to 425. Prepare streusel filling: In a medium bowl, combine the flour, brown sugar, oats and melted butter or margarine. Pinch to form coarse crumbs. Set aside.

Wash apples and, with a melon baller, carefully scoop out the core, creating a "bowl" about 2 in. in diameter. Be careful not to go all the way to the bottom or to break the sides. Fill each apple with the streusel filling, stuffing them to their tops.

Arrange apples in a shallow 9-in. square baking dish.

In a small bowl, stir apple juice, honey and cinnamon. Pour into the baking pan. Bake, uncovered, for 25 to 30 minutes or until apples are tender. If streusel starts to burn, loosely cover with a piece of foil.

Carefully remove apples to a platter or individual dessert dishes. Drizzle apples with pan juices or thick caramel and serve warm with a scoop of your favourite ice cream or whipped cream. Yield: 6 servings.

Thick Caramel

1/2 tsp. food-quality Dutch-process cocoa powder, such as Droste brand
2/3 cup nondairy whipping cream, such as Richwhip brand
1 cup light corn syrup
1/2 cup water
3 cups sugar
1-1/2 tsp. lime juice
1 tbsp. margarine
3/4 tsp. pure vanilla extract

In a medium bowl, whisk cocoa powder in whipping cream until completely dissolved, smoothing out any lumps. Add corn syrup, whisk again and set aside.

In a medium heavy-bottomed pot, combine water, sugar and lime juice.

Over medium-high heat, bring mixture to a boil, stirring constantly until sugar dissolves. With a pastry brush soaked in water, brush the sides of the pot clean to remove splatters.

Cook without stirring. As the water evaporates, the bubbles will become bigger and slower; start watching for caramel colour to appear. Swirl or turn the pot to avoid getting a burned spot and to evenly mix the syrup. Simmer until mixture is an amber colour. Go by the colour, as the heat will differ from stove to stove. Don't allow the caramel to burn and work carefully so as not to burn yourself.

Whisk in whipping cream mixture. The caramel will bubble profusely and may clump. Keep stirring until the caramel is smooth in colour and texture. Simmer for 2 to 3 minutes or until slightly thickened. Remove from heat and stir in margarine and vanilla. The caramel will be extremely hot, so exercise caution as you carefully transfer it to a large bowl and place it in the refrigerator. The caramel will thicken as it cools. To use as a topping, reheat in the microwave until syrupy.

Gefilte fishing the easy way

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

As the High Holidays approach, one traditional dish is sure to appear on festive tables around the world – gefilte fish.

I can still remember the smell of my mother's homemade gefilte fish slowly simmering away on the stove when I was a little girl growing up in Winnipeg. My mom would take me with her to the fish market, where she would choose a combination of fresh whitefish, pickerel and pike – no carp ever darkened her gefilte fish! She'd mix the ingredients in her mixmaster and I would watch, fascinated, as the mixture climbed up the beaters until it was silky smooth. Mom insisted that the fish had to cook for at least two hours to be sure it was thoroughly cooked – our house reeked for days afterwards.

I refused to eat gefilte fish despite her efforts. But my Mom was a sneaky cook and quite the maven when it came to recycling food. She'd slice up the chilled gefilte fish, then dip each slice in beaten egg and seasoned bread crumbs (usually homemade). Then she'd fry the slices in melted butter or hot oil on both sides until golden and crispy.

I still love gefilte fish best that way. Instead of an electric mixer, I mix up the gefilte fish mixture in my food processor. I've boiled it, baked it in a loaf pan and in a Bundt pan. I've even microwaved it to reduce the cooking time and the smell!

I remember when my late aunt, Clara Tobin, decided to cook 20 pounds of gefilte fish one day in her Cote St. Luc apartment. She had several big pots simmering away on several burners and the smell wafted throughout the hallways. My Uncle Jack told us that when he walked into the lobby of their apartment building that evening he could smell the fish cooking all the way from their 10th-floor apartment! It took several days for the smell to dissipate.

Although many people still make homemade gefilte fish, today's busy balabustas welcome shortcuts to save on time. Frozen gefilte fish logs and jarred gefilte fish to the rescue!

When I asked my 93-year-old mother what she thought of using the frozen gefilte logs, her answer was "Pheh! If you want gefilte fish I'll make you the real thing! What is there to making gefilte fish? Just go to the fish market and buy me some fresh fish. And if you like, I'll make some cheese knishes for you, too!"

Natalie Herbin of New Jersey wrote: "I usually take the frozen gefilte fish out of the wrapper and bake it in the oven at 350. You can use any type of spices that you like. I prefer to top it with salsa. I bake the fish until it's golden brown, about an hour or so. It has a very different taste and texture than boiled. My friend uses it to make fish balls and serves it with rice or pasta. Both ways are good."

Sherry Canter of Toronto wrote: "I often make gefilte fish from the frozen loaves. When I am boiling it, I add sliced carrots and onions, salt, pepper and sometimes a little sugar to the cooking water. Not too exciting but better than using plain water!"

Barb Bakerman of Montreal buys prepared gefilte fish from Kosher Kravings, a caterer in Montreal. She likes to slice it and layer it with paper towelling in a Tupperware container to keep it from being too watery and serves it with a mixture of horseradish and beets.

Abby Rachelson of Montreal wrote: "Moroccans like to put tomato sauce on their gefilte fish and serve it warm. I've had it made into tiny balls topped with a spicy tomato sauce. Another time it was made into a loaf, topped with sauce mixed with sliced Moroccan olives."

Fran Pellatt of Montreal wrote: "Last Passover was the first time I used frozen gefilte fish. In the past, I always bought it ready made in a loaf or jar or tin. What I bought was made from salmon (pink in colour) and I cooked it as per the instructions. I put onions on the bottom of the pot and threw in some carrots so I could have them to put on top of my slices (just like my mother used to do – although she made the gefilte fish from scratch). Everyone loved it."

Aliza Novogroder Fischman of North Jersey lives up to her name – she's definitely a "fisch maven!" She wrote: "One easy thing I like to do is saute a chopped red onion and chopped green pepper in 2 tbsp. oil until soft and golden. Then I take an 8-ounce can of tomato sauce and unwrap the frozen fish loaf. In a loaf pan, I layer half the tomato sauce and sauteed veggies. Then I add the fish loaf and top it with the remaining tomato sauce and veggies. Bake at 350 for about an hour and it's done!

The version below with spinach is one of my favourite ways to make gefilte fish. My kids love it too! It's in the archives of the Jewish Food list at http://www.jewishfood-list.com."

ALIZA FISCHMAN'S GEFILTE FISH LOAF WITH SPINACH

Source: My mother, Gittel Novogroder (AKA Uncle Shmiel's sister)

2 (22 oz. each) frozen gefilte fish loaves, defrosted in their wrappers
2 10-oz. boxes frozen chopped spinach, thawed
1 tbsp. mayonnaise (light mayo is fine)
salt and pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 350. Make sure fish and spinach are completely thawed. Squeeze the spinach to remove as much of the water as you can. Really try to get it as dry as you can.

Stir all ingredients together in a bowl until spinach is well distributed and the mixture is even in colour. Spray either a 9x5-in. loaf pan or an 8-in. square or round cake pan with nonstick spray.

Pour mixture into the pan and spread evenly. Bake uncovered for about 1 hour or until a golden brown crust forms. Serves 16.

Naomi Silbermintz of Sherman Oaks, Calif., wrote: "This is incredibly simple to make, uses only two ingredients and looks so impressive. I wish I remembered where I found the recipe so that I could give credit where credit is due! I think I got it from someone on the Jewish Food List."

DONNA STEINHORN'S QUICK GEFILTE FISH FROM A JAR

1 jar gefilte fish (my family prefers sweet)
1/2 cup water
1 sweet onion, diced
1 carrot, sliced

Empty gefilte fish into a pot, jelly and all. Add water, onion and carrot slices and bring to a boil.

Reduce heat, cover and simmer about 30 to 45 minutes. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Chill in the refrigerator. Yield: 4 servings. Multiplies easily.

Linda Warner of West Bloomfield, Mich., makes a similar version to Donna's, but uses a jar of whitefish and pike gefilte fish. Linda wrote: "I do what my mother has done forever. Mom called it 'doctoring up the jarred fish.' We drain the liquid (never gel) from a jar of gefilte fish into an empty pot. Add 1 quartered onion with the skin on, 2 sliced carrots and 2 chopped celery stalks. Bring to a boil, then simmer until carrots are soft, 10 to 15 minutes. Turn off the heat, add the fish and let the broth season the fish. Add salt and white pepper to taste. Chill before serving."

Sandra Phillips of Montreal wrote: "My Mom Flo Phillips from New York City, who usually makes it from scratch, in a pinch, has taken the bottled fish and dumped it into a big pot as if she had made real fish (she normally simmers hers, not bakes). She then adds the jelly from the jar, some water to cover, sliced carrots, sliced onions, sliced celery, some salt and pepper to taste, and simmers it for about 45 minutes so it loses its bottled taste. She serves it with a slice of carrot on top (no celery or onions) and homemade horseradish."

Eleanor Jourard of Belleville wrote: "I have used many different types of fish in this fish chowder recipe, from cod to salmon, and it's always great. I make it with the broth from canned or jarred gefilte fish because I hate to waste good food! I adapted the recipe from one that appeared in The Treasury of Newfoundland Dishes, 1971 (Published by Maple Leaf Mills Ltd., Newfoundland). Note: the original recipe starts with "Fry salt pork… add onions.")

ELEANOR JOURARD'S GEFILTE FISH BROTH CHOWDER

broth from a jar or can of gefilte fish (or 1/2 cup water)
1 tbsp. butter, oil or margarine
1 or 2 medium onions, chopped
1-1/2 cups peeled and sliced potatoes
salt and pepper to taste
1 lb. any fish fillets, cubed
3 cups milk (2 per cent or skim)
2 tbsp. extra butter (optional)
soda crackers

Drain broth from gefilte fish and reserve.

Melt 1 tbsp. butter in large pot. Saute onions until limp but not browned.Add potatoes, salt and pepper, along with broth. Bring to a boil, cover and simmer on low heat for 10 minutes, stirring occasionally.

Add fish and simmer gently about 10 minutes longer, just until fish is opaque. Add more water if necessary.

Add milk and butter and heat gently (do not boil). Serve with soda crackers to crush on top. (If too thin, add some instant potato flakes or a little flour dissolved in water; if too thick, add a little milk.) Yield: 4 servings.

Peres and Abbas say peace is closer than ever

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

OME — Israeli President Shimon Peres appeared le by side with Palestinian President Mahmoud bbas last Friday at the Ambrosetti Forum, an nual gathering of global political and business ders in an Italian lakeside resort.

The two leaders spoke before the crowd about political, diplomatic and security situation that sts between Israel and the Palestinians and the ab world in general, and they said that Israel and Palestinian Authority are closer than ever to a ace deal.

Abbas pledged to try to reach a final status peace reement with Israel by the end of the year, but he mitted that the goal, set by U.S. President George Bush, might not be achieved.

Abbas also rejected the notion that he and Israeli me Minister Ehud Olmert might put forth a partial cument outlining the areas they agree on and ving open other issues – most notably, and most sitive, the sharing of Jerusalem as a joint capital.

"It is necessary for the agreement to address .. issues," said Abbas. "It is all or nothing, lly," he continued.

Abbas and Olmert – and their negotiating teams – have held periodic, secret meetings since peace talks were restarted at Annapolis, Md., last November.

Palestinian officials close to the talks have said that some progress has been made on the issue of borders, but the issue of Jerusalem – especially the Old City with its Jewish, Muslim and Christian holy sites – appears to be as stuck as ever.

The sides also have been unable to come up with a formula addressing the plight of millions of Palestinian refugees and their descendants.

Asked about a possible Likud victory in the next Israeli election, Abbas sidestepped the issue.

"We might not be able to reach a final status agreement by the end of the year," he said. "We will make all possible efforts."

Abbas said if no deal is reached while Bush is in office, "the new administration should not wait seven years for us to start negotiations. It should begin immediately as soon as a new president is in the White House."

Israeli President Shimon Peres, who has used his largely ceremonial role and his stature as an elder statesman to push peace efforts in the past, addressed the forum after Abbas.

"We have to try to reach an agreement," Peres said. "We have to act on the supposition that it is possible."

Referring to Hamas, Iran and Hezbollah, Peres said that the next elections in the Palestinian Authority must be carried out as a truly democratic process. He emphasized that the concept of democracy must be upheld, not only on the day the election takes place, but more importantly on the day after.

"It is illogical that an organization abuses the tools of democracy to install a military, terrorist, murderous and religious fanatic dictatorship," said Peres.

Peres stressed that Iran is a fanatical regime that is a threat to the Middle East and the entire world.

"I do not support military action against Iran, but the world must become a united front and impose harsh economic sanctions on Iran," Peres said.

He also urged progress with Syria, which is currently engaged in indirect talks with Israel via Turkish mediation. He called for Syrian President Bashar Assad to make a personal gesture similar to the dramatic 1977 Jerusalem visit by Anwar Sadat of Egypt, which led to a peace agreement in 1979.

"I think if President Assad will create a visit to Israel or alternatively invite the prime minister of Israel to go to Damascus, we shall see a major change," he said. "I believe the best way is to start with a meeting and then have negotiations."

Abbas, whose people have sometimes fretted that prioritizing wider Mideast agreements might leave the Palestinians in the cold, said he would support Israeli progress with Syria or other Arab states.

"Possible success for those negotiations could facilitate peace for us, too, said Abbas. "If the Arab League proposal [to return all lands captured in 1967 in exchange for peace] were adopted, 27 Islamic states would proceed with peace with Israel. Israel would be in an ocean of peace."

In related news, a Palestinian official said Abbas will hold talks with Bush on Sept. 26 at the White House.

Abbas' aide, Nabil Abu Rdeneh, said Monday that the two leaders will discuss the fate of Israeli-Palestinian peace talks, which began several months ago.

Although negotiators say they are discussing all key issues, no visible progress has been made. It's not clear whether talks will continue beyond the end of the year.

Abbas was scheduled to address Arab foreign ministers in Cairo on Monday.

Political realities may doom Olmert's final push for peace

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Analysis

With his Kadima Party just days away from electing a new leader, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is making a concerted last-ditch effort to reach a peace deal with the Palestinians.

Olmert has drawn up a detailed peace offer and presented it to U.S. and Palestinian leaders. After being shown the plan last week, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice described it as "very generous."

Although the Palestinians say wide gaps remain, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Olmert reportedly agreed in talks last week to make every effort to wrap up a full-fledged peace agreement by the end of the year.

But both sides are skeptical.

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and former P.A. Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia, who are involved in a parallel negotiation that is conducting line-by-line drafting of a final-status agreement, estimate that the process could go on well into 2009 and beyond. They say the effort must be given all the time it needs.

Warning against the danger of rushing things, Livni said artificial deadlines could lead to frustration on the Palestinian side and spark a third intifadah. Alternatively, time pressure could lead Israel to compromise on vital interests.

Right-wing opposition to the Olmert-Abbas talks go even further. Opposition leaders have questioned the very legitimacy of Olmert's conducting a vigorous peace drive so close to the end of his term. Likud Party leader Benjamin Netanyahu described Olmert's peace plan as "morally and substantially flawed" and warned that it would strengthen Hamas.

There are problems on the Palestinian side, too.

Abbas' term could end early next year, leaving the Palestinians with a more radical leadership before an agreement is finally wrapped up.

What's worse is that as long as Hamas controls the Gaza Strip, the chances of implementing any Israeli-Palestinian peace deal are virtually zero.

Olmert's latest proposal deals with four core issues: territory, security, refugees and Jerusalem.

On territory, he offers the Palestinians 93 per cent of the West Bank, with Israel retaining large Jewish settlement blocs in the remaining seven per cent. As compensation, the Palestinians would get an area equivalent to 5.5 per cent of the West Bank in Israeli land close to the Gaza Strip, and a land corridor connecting Gaza and the West Bank, linking the two in a single Palestinian state.

On security, Olmert proposes that the future Palestinian state would be demilitarized and barred from building military alliances. Israel would have early warning stations on the Samarian hills in the West Bank, a temporary army presence in the Jordan Valley, a presence at border crossings, control of airspace over Gaza and the West Bank, and access to the main east-west corridors in the West Bank.

On refugees, Olmert categorically rejects the so-called Palestinian right of return: Palestinian refugees would be entitled to return to the Palestinian state in unlimited numbers, but not to Israel proper. Still, there is a small concessionary loophole in the Olmert proposal: 1,500 to 2,000 Palestinians would be allowed to "return" to Israel proper every year for 10 years for "humanitarian reasons." In other words Israel could, at its discretion, allow the immigration over 10 years of 15,000 to 20,000 Palestinians.

Although Olmert insists that Jerusalem has not been on the negotiating agenda – the Orthodox Shas party has threatened to topple the government if Jerusalem is so much as discussed – the prime minister does include a temporary solution for the city in his proposal.

The final Israeli-Palestinian document would include reference to "a joint mechanism with a fixed timetable" for resolving the dispute over Jerusalem. Olmert's aides refuse to elaborate but say there would be elements in the joint mechanism "attractive to the Palestinians."

This apparently refers partly to an offer by Olmert to involve other Arab and international parties — including Jordan, Morocco, Egypt, the Vatican and the international Quartet grouping of the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations – in seeking a permanent solution for Jerusalem and its holy places.

The Palestinians, however, argue that Olmert's proposals do not go far enough, and they insist that the gaps between the Israeli and Palestinian positions remain wide.

Some analysts suggest that the only realistic way forward would be through American bridging proposals. But the Americans are unlikely to be forthcoming: During a visit in June, when Rice asked for a paper highlighting key points of agreement and disagreement, both sides refused on the grounds that that kind of hands-on American intervention would not be helpful at this stage.

"We and the Israelis told Dr. Rice that the decisions are required from Palestinians and Israelis," senior Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erakat told JTA. "I am sure the Americans, the Arabs and the Europeans will stand shoulder to shoulder with us in order to implement whatever we agree. But the decisions are for Palestinians and Israelis."

Officials close to Olmert argue that even if it can't immediately be implemented, a joint Israel Palestinian document on permanent-status issue would constitute a historic breakthrough.

"We believe it would become a galvanizin point for all the moderates and offer an alterna tive to the Hamas-Hezbollah-Tehran paradigm Olmert spokesman Mark Regev said.

Regev believes that not only would the de win wide international support and boost th moderates in the Arab world, it also would he resolve the problem of Israeli settlement in th West Bank.

"If we are successful in delineating to a gre degree of specificity where the final borders w be, then obviously we will continue to build in t settlements on our side and not in those on the P estinian side," he told JTA.

In other words, immediately upon signing t deal, Israel would regard settlements on its si of the border as part of Israel proper, with no e trinsic restrictions on development and grow Those on the Palestinian side, by contrast, wou be seen as living on borrowed time and slated f evacuation.

For any agreement to stand a chance of i plementation, its advocates would have to fin way around Palestinian rejectionists – includi Hamas in Gaza – and around Israeli opponen In both cases, opponents may press for new el tions, which would serve as a referendum on t peace deal.

That does not bode well for a peace de Hamas is unlikely to allow elections in Ga unless it is sure of winning. On the Israeli si polls suggest the right-wing opposition will w the next general election.

Should either of these likely scenarios occ the "shelf agreement" the Olmert administration working on probably would be shelved indefini ly. That would leave Olmert's eleventh-hour effo to set a new peace agenda, like many others befo it, dead in the water of Middle Eastern realities

Israel & the Jewish World

The language of anti-Semitism

By DAVE RICH
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Comment

When, in 2003, the veteran Labour MP Tam Dalyell described the then-British prime minister Tony Blair as being influenced by a "Jewish cabal," he was roundly condemned for making what many saw as an obviously anti-Semitic remark. Some, though, sought to justify his comment as a legitimate, if poorly worded, criticism of Israel's supporters, rather than something more sinister.

The late left-wing journalist Paul Foot, writing in the Guardian, explained that Dalyell was "wrong to complain about Jewish pressure on Blair and Bush when he means Zionist pressure."

A 1962 cartoon showing a Jewish banker wielding a whip in the shape of the pound over the heads of the three major U.K. political parties.

The idea that political leaders are influenced for malign purposes by Jews is at the heart of modern anti-Semitism. It is an alarming but increasingly familiar notion that by swapping "Zionist" for "Jewish" – i.e., that the then prime minister was surrounded by a "Zionist cabal" – Dalyell's comment can be rendered apparently "bigotry-free." This is typical of an anti-Semitic discourse by which the most common ideas, themes and images from the history of anti-Semitism have re-emerged in recent years, cloaked in an anti-Israel or anti-Zionist wrapping.

This is something that the U.K.'s All-Party Parliamentary Inquiry into AntiSemitism recognized. The inquiry's report noted the existence of an anti-Semitic discourse, the difficulty in identifying and defining it, and that ideas and images with roots in traditional anti-Semitism crop up in anti-Israel commentary and activism. The inquiry called on the media in particular to consider "the impact of language and imagery in current discourse on Judaism, anti-Zionism and Israel."

This is not an easy subject to analyze. Opinions will differ over exactly where, or whether, an anti-Israel screed becomes anti-Semitic. Often, the writer or publisher in question may be completely unaware that the words or images they choose have an anti-Semitic provenance. There is a necessary process of education before it can even be asked why a particular metaphor appealed to them, or why they thought it would resonate with their readers.

In an effort to measure and track the phenomenon, my organization, CST, which provides security and defence services to the U.K. Jewish community and advises government and police on anti-Semitism and terrorism, has published its first survey of anti-Semitism in mainstream discourse in Britain. This publication will be produced annually – the first one covers 2007 – and will complement our existing reports into anti-Semitic incidents each year.

One example is of a magazine article about the pro-Israel lobby in the United States that was illustrated with a cartoon of a giant sea dragon, emblazoned with what looked like a Star of David, but was in fact the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) logo, a nuance that will have been missed by many of its British readers. Anti-Semitic iconography has long portrayed Jews as dragons, both in their individual physicality and as an abstract, collective force.

When a funding scandal broke involving donors to the Labour party, and some (although by no means most) of the figures linked to the scandal happened to be Jewish, the Independent's columnist Yasmin Alibhai-Brown wrote of "the shadowy role of Labour friends of Israel" and described the central figure in the story as a "strange shape-shifter," while expressing her fear of "the wrath of Moses" for daring to ask such questions.

We also found – and this is something with which Ha'aretz, like every major media organization, has to grapple – that new media have opened a space, via online social networks, talkboards, message forums and so on, for expressions of anti-Semitism and other bigotry that previously only existed on extremist websites.

When the British Medical Journal ran an online poll asking if readers supported or opposed an academic boycott of Israel, one reader left the message: "Would you not boycott dr mengele [sic]?" An infamous posting on the BBC talkboards, which the BBC moderators removed and then put back after they decided it did not contravene their rules, read: "Zionism is a racist ideology where jews are given supremacy over all other races and faiths. This is found in the Talmud…"

When neo-Nazis allege Jewish control of the media or government, Jewish conspiracies to cause war or global foment, or Jewish infanticide and bloodlust, and when their propaganda portrays Jews as snakes, dragons or other beasts, nobody questions whether it is anti-Semitic. When similar allegations are made and associations drawn, but about supporters of Israel, not Jews per se, and set in the context of arguments over Israel and the Palestinians, there are plenty of people who cannot, or will not, see the connection between this contemporary discourse and an anti-Semitic past. Neo-Nazis have spotted this, and now also talk about Zionists, not Jews, blurring the distinctions further.

Anti-Semitism is not just about the hate crimes that make up the numbers of anti-Semitic incidents that get reported each year; it is also about the ideas, words and images of anti-Semitic discourse. We hope our report will go some way to helping measure, assess and understand this side of a very old bigotry.

Dave Rich is deputy director of communications for CST.

Israel Briefs

Police to probe 'Notegate'

Israeli police will investigate the removal and publication of the note that U.S. presidential candidate Barack Obama placed in the Western Wall. Deputy State Prosecutor Shai Nitzan ordered the probe last week. Obama's prayer note was removed from a crack in the wall during his July visit to Israel and published in the daily Ma'ariv. The yeshiva student who removed the note later apologized and returned it. A complaint filed with the State Prosecutor's office said the incident violated Obama's right to privacy and laws protecting religious sites. It said worshippers at the wall may now fear that their privacy could be violated.

Barak speaks to Al-Jazeera

Parts of eastern Jerusalem could be the capital of a future Palestinian state, Ehud Barak told Al-Jazeera. "Our basic position is that Jerusalem is the capital of Israel, but that we can find a formula under which certain neighbourhoods, heavily populated Arab neighborhoods, could become in a peace agreement part of the Palestinian capital, and it will of course include all of the neighboring villages around Jerusalem," the defence minister told the Arab news station. Barak's appearance on the channel's English edition violates Israel's boycott of the Qatar-based network, which stems from recent problematic coverage of Israel. President Shimon Peres appeared on the network's Arabic channel last week. Barak rejected the right of return for Palestinian refugees, but said humanitarian issues could be resolved. He also told Al-Jazeera he expected Israel's security fence to be the border with a future Palestinian state, but there's leeway to change parts of its route.

Mossad let Nazi escape

Israel's spy agency found Nazi death camp doctor Josef Mengele in 1960 but let him get away. Rafi Eitan, the Israeli spymaster who is now a cabinet minister, said that he and other Mossad operatives discovered Mengele with his wife in a Buenos Aires apartment, but decided not to capture him, fearing it would compromise the capture of Adolf Eichmann. A Mossad team returned to the area several weeks later, but Mengele had disappeared. Mengele, who performed experiments on camp inmates, especially twins, and supervised selections for the gas chambers, suffered a stroke and drowned in Brazil in 1979 at the age of 68. "I would have done the same thing again today," Eitan told the Jerusalem Post. "I think that had we gone for them both at the same time, we would have lost them both."

Hezbollah ties stay: Assad

Bashar Assad said he won't cut Syria's ties with Hezbollah, despite other statements the Syrian president made signalling progress in peace talks with Israel. A key Israeli demand in the indirect talks is that Syria cease its support for the Lebanese militia. Speaking to Hezbollah's Al-Manar TV, Assad said: "I don't see any way to give up on Hezbollah. Our stance is as clear as always. We do not believe that our interest is to give up on resistance."

Iran to Sarkozy: Our nukes don't pose threat to region, world

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEHRAN — Tehran on Sept. 5 rejected remarks by French President Nicolas Sarkozy that Iran's nuclear weapons program is a threat to the region and global community.

"Nuclear weapons have no place in Iran's defence doctrine," said foreign ministry spokesperson Hassan Ghashghav, Iran's Fars news agency reported.

Sarkozy had earlier asked Syrian President Bashar al-Assad in Damascus for support in opposing Iran's controversial nuclear program.

While acknowledging Iran's right to have nuclear power, Sarkozy stressed that Iranian nuclear weapons would be a threat to the region and the whole world .

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

Sarkozy warned Iran on Sept. 4 that it was taking a dangerous gamble in seeking to develop atomic weapons because one day Israel could strike to foil its nuclear aspirations.

Western powers accuse Iran of seeking the atom bomb under the cover of a civilian nuclear program but Tehran denies the charge, insisting it only wants to master atomic technology in order to generate electricity.

The United States and Israel have not ruled out military action if the dispute cannot be settled through diplomacy.

"Iran is taking a major risk in continuing the process to obtain a military nuclear capacity," Sarkozy told a meeting in Damascus with the leaders of Syria, Turkey and Qatar.

"One day, whatever the Israeli government, we could find one morning that Israel has struck," Sarkozy added.

"The question is not whether it would be legitimate, whether it would be intelligent. What will we do at that moment? It would be a catastrophe. We must avoid that catastrophe," Sarkozy told the meeting in comments broadcast on television.

Nicolas Sarkozy

Speculation about a possible attack on Iran's nuclear facilities has risen since Israel staged an air force exercise in June which was reported to be a simulation of a strike against Iran.

Israel's daily Ma'ariv reported that the country has put plans for a unilateral military strike against Iran into high gear.

A government committee is preparing a contingency plan to attack Iran, should diplomatic efforts to derail Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program fail, the paper reported.

Ephraim Sneh, a Labor party lawmaker, has sent an eight-point document to both U.S. presidential candidates, saying, "There is no government in Jerusalem that would ever reconcile itself to a nuclear Iran. When it is clear Iran is on the verge of acquiring nuclear weapons, an Israeli military strike to prevent this will be seriously considered."

Sneh suggested the window of opportunity for non-military options to stop Iran from going nuclear is 18 to 24 months.

French President Sarkozy has asked Syrian President Bashar Assad to help resolve the standoff with Iran, a close ally of Syria, and Assad has pledged to help seek a solution.

"The solution is to find a mechanism to prove that this nuclear program is a peaceful program," Assad told France 2 television in an interview, adding that he understood why the West was worried about the idea of Iran getting the bomb.

"Of course the West is frightened. We don't want the nuclear bomb in the Middle East," he said.

The United Nations Security Council has imposed three rounds of sanctions against Iran over its failure to heed calls to suspend uranium enrichment, a process that can produce fuel for power plants or, potentially, nuclear weapons.

Sarkozy repeated his call on Iran to halt enrichment and said Tehran should accept stricter inspections by the UN nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).

"If Iran continues enrichment, that is a problem. But IAEA checks should at least take place in a complete manner. Then [Iran's] good faith would be stablished," he said.

Iran is in talks with the IAEA on improving its co-operation with the agency, but Sarkozy did not say what "complete" inspections would be in his view.

Tehran has also so far failed to respond to a sweetened offer of incentives by France, Britain, Germany, the United States, Russia and China aimed at persuading it, initially, to freeze expansion of its nuclear work.

Commenting on the American presidential campaign, Iran's hard-line president says the next U.S. president – regardless whether it's a Democrat or a Republican – must change policies and focus more on America's domestic problems rather than looking for intervention abroad.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad spoke in an interview with Japanese broadcaster NHK that was carried by the official IRNA news agency on Sept. 5.

In the interview, the Iranian president said Tehran would welcome dialogue with the next U.S. administration – provided current American policies change.

Ahmadinejad also said it doesn't matter whether Barack Obama or John McCain get elected. He added that the next U.S. president must curtail American intervention abroad and change policy toward Iran.

Book clubs flourish at synagogues across Canada

By DOROTHY LIPOVENKO
Special to The CJN

Dangling kites, whirling kaleidoscopes, a baby swing draped in a crimson blanket: it's always a surprise what household props Anita Miller will use to set the stage when her synagogue book group meets to discuss its latest choice.

Catherine Gildiner, above, and Naomi Alderman's Disobedience are among the books and authors discussed at book clubs at synagogues across Canada.

"I like to take a theme from the book and create a scene," says Miller, co-founder of Montreal's Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem's book club, and its regular host at her home.

In its fifth year, the Cote St. Luc-area group illustrates the popular and fast-growing interest among synagogues and temples to offer literary enthusiasts a forum to review and talk about books.

While open to all, these programs attract a largely over-50 following of mostly women and not a few men who, by their own admission, are avid readers or credit the experience with broadening their reading tastes.

The book clubs indeed cut a wide swath in their choice of material, with some avoiding biographies, bestsellers and non-fiction, while others insist on a Jewish connection through theme or author.

Discussion styles swing from casual – a freewheeling talk around a swimming pool recently kicked off Temple Kol Ami's book group in Thornhill, Ont. – to more structured, notably guest reviewers taking the podium at Ottawa's Agudath Israel for a 40-minute book review followed by a moderated discussion.

This month marks the return of many reading clubs from summer break, during which participants, like those at Beth Shalom in Edmonton, use the time to dive into the upcoming season's reading list circulated in the spring.

Typically, contemporary fiction with Jewish content or a Jewish author mark the selections of Beth Shalom's Women's League book group, notes chairwoman Moira Sacks.

Philip Roth's The Plot Against America; The Coffee Trader, a chronicle of 17th-century Dutch Jewry by Dayid Liss, and British author Naomi Alderman's tale of Orthodox Disobedience are among the novels that have generated buzz while satisfying the selection criteria.

Rotating through various members' homes, the informal meetings underscore the approach taken by the Edmonton group, which is not so much interested in literary style as "understanding how a novel relates to Judaism historically or in the present," says Sacks, noting, for example, that reading Disobedience "takes us out of our comfort level of being Conservative [affiliated] Jewish women."

Like fellow bibliophiles undeterred by the cold of a Canadian winter, Sheila Baslaw of Ottawa "hates to miss" even a single get-together of Agudath Israel's Malca Pass book group. "It brings people together to talk," says Baslaw of the opportunity to socialize with others who enjoy reading.

One of the longest-running synagogue book programs and with several original members from its start almost 18 years ago, the Ottawa club attracts up to 30 participants when it meets – as it will six times from now to next May – to hear guest reviewers drawn from local academia, as well as its own membership.

At Malca Pass, which shares the name of the synagogue's library that purchases copies of titles to circulate among club members, the journey from bookshelf to book club is a rigorous one.

Sophie Kohn Kaminsky, chairwoman of a volunteer committee that decides the choice of titles, says deliberations begin months in advance. Relying on suggestions, Jewish websites and award nominations for prizes such as the Giller, the committee draws up a preliminary list, which is then filtered for certain criteria. Those that make the final cut "must be acknowledged as significant works of literature," says Kohn Kaminsky. "We're not looking at bestsellers."

At least half the choices aim to have a Jewish author or content specific to Jews, and central to the vetting process, she noted, is whether a book is discussable, in print and easily available.

"We're opening people's minds and giving them the opportunity to explore something they may not be familiar with," Kohn Kaminsky says.

On tap for this season is an international roster that includes

Meir Shalev's A Pigeon and a Boy, Lawrence Hill's The Book of Negroes and Catherine Gildiner's Too Close to the Falls.

While finding itself in the "push pull" of whether to include fiction as well as non-fiction, the book group at London, Ont.'s Temple Israel is certain about one thing: its selections must have a Jewish theme, says organizer Vivian Macdonald.

The newly formed group, which meets the last Thursday of the month, already counts up to a dozen members, and its literary eye has been cast on the likes of Maggie Anton's Rashi's Daughter and Sandy Tolan's The Lemon Tree.

"It's a discipline, an encouragement to read," says Macdonald of the benefits to an audience of hearing a book review. "It's helping people to think about what they are reading instead of just reading [a book] from front to back."

Many book club regulars agree they are reading more and welcome the exchange of ideas. "It gives us a chance to put our minds in another gear and shmooze together," says Michael Rozenek, a longtime participant in Tifereth Beth David's book group.

By RENA GODFREY
Special to The CJN

Betty's large brown eyes stare right through you as she clutches her doll.

She is lying in a hospital bed, and her angelic smile emanates warmth and hope, revealing a deep understanding of life well beyond her five years.

Betty is one of the subjects captured in the international photography exhibition From Art To Heart, presented by RBC and Save A Child's Heart (SACH), and opening at the MaRS Centre in Toronto Sept. 15.

From Art To Heart, a joint effort of SACH and the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs, is travelling across the world in celebration of Israel's 60th birthday.

Betty, who was born with an atrial septal defect, and severe pulmonary stenosis, travelled with her mother from Ethiopia to Israel in 2006 to have her congenital heart defect repaired. Like the other children photographed, Betty is one of the children who has received life-saving surgery from SACH, a team of 70 Israeli doctors, nurses and support staff.

Established in 1995, SACH is an Israeli-based, international humanitarian program whose mission is to improve pediatric cardiac care in the Third World and developing countries for children, regardless of their religious or national status.

The exhibition, created by seven Israeli photographers, bears witness to the emotional and physical journeys that these brave children and their families have experienced. The photographs reveal both the angst and joy that both parent and patient endure while dealing with their medical crisis.

Betty, one of the subjects captured in the exhibition at the MaRS Centre, which opens on Sept. 15.

Photographer Gili Yaari documented Betty and the other children in the group from Addis Ababa for more than a year, through their surgeries and recuperation. SACH volunteer Sheila Shalhevet photographs every child who comes to SACH, in the hospital wards or at the SACH home, which is situated in Azur, near the Wolfson Medical Center in Jerusalem.

The photo exhibit is free, and school groups from grades 5 to 12 are invited. "We want to draw the children in through the theme of journey, both in the emotional and physical sense," Karen Diamond, president of SACH Canada says. "Children of all religious and cultural backgrounds can relate to these photographs. The photography exhibition is truly about mending hearts and building bridges."

Having had the privilege of visiting the Wolfson Medical Center and SACH house, I can attest to the powerful and realistic images that were photographed for the exhibition. I will never forget the images that I took home with me: Palestinian fathers rolling out their rugs in the middle of the hospital room getting ready for their midday prayers; children and parents from the Palestinian Territories smiling and chatting with me; children from Zanzibar and Tanzania playing together with my children in the SACH home, while their mothers or caregivers cooked together and cared for one another; Muslims, Christians and Jews working side by side in Israel.

Unfortunately, these images etched in my memory, like the images photographed in From Art To Heart, are rarely picked up by the international press. An exhibition such as From Art to Heart highlights the positive connections being made between Israelis and the rest of the world.

From Art To Heart is a riveting exhibition that will undoubtedly educate and draw attention to SACH and its humanitarian mission.

From Art to Heart runs Sept. 15 to 25 at MaRS Centre Atrium, 101 College St. For more information, call 416-324-9113. www.saveachildsheart.ca

To know the unknowable

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

To know the unknowable has been a human yearning since men and women first looked upon the starry canopy of the nighttime heavens.

What do our lives mean?
What was our beginning?
What will be our end?

Debra Linesch, a professor of art and family therapy at the Jesuit Loyola Marymount University in Los Angeles and Evelyn Stettin, a Los Angeles artist, have collaborated to create a small but riveting visual speculation into those very questions in a booklet called Panim El Panim: Facing Genesis Visual Midrash (Marymount Institute Press).

Linesch and Stettin reflect upon the infinity of questions, images, layers, metaphors and meanings that stir their hearts and, equally, their imaginations in the first 12 parshiot in the Book of Genesis.

To the time-honoured Jewish tradition of delving into and asking questions about the text, Linesch and Stettin have added what they refer to as "visual midrash" too, namely, artwork, highly personal pictorial explorations of an aspect of the text's meaning.

These visual midrashim are "commentaries" expressed in the form of colourful, robust, bold, abstract paintings. The drawings are not easy to understand. How could they be? Abstract painting is meant to convey emotional rather than intellectual consonance.

The authors intend mystery. And they achieve it handsomely.

Panim el Panim (Face to Face) is the encounter man can never have with God. Only Moses was allowed to "see" the Divine and that was, as described enigmatically in the Book of Exodus, only a glimpse of God's back.

The commentaries in the booklet are minimalist and aphoristic, almost pointillist in a visual art sense. The combination with the paintings, Linesch writes, creates "meaning between text and imagery, face to face."

It is a challenging work.

Kindertransport, which runs at the Al Green Theatre in November, tells the powerful story of one family's experience during the dramatic transport of almost 10,000 children from Germany, Austria and Czechoslovakia to Britain between 1938 and the outbreak of World War II.

Tuesdays With Morrie, based on the bestselling book by Mitch Albom, features Linden in the tale about life lessons that pass between a young man and his elderly mentor. It's slated for the Winter Garden Theatre next May.

Mixing theatre, dance and music, Zisele is a nostalgic and humorous look at the relationship between mothers and daughters. Starring the original cast from Israel, it's being produced in association with the Luminato Festival for a run at the Jane Mallet Theatre next June.

"Each of these three remarkable plays deals with the richness and complexities of family relationships," said David Eisner, who is co-artistic director of the company with Avery Saltzman. Subscriptions for the three-play season run from $115 to $160 and are available by phone at 416-366-7723 or online at www.hgjewishtheatre.com.

New production company reinvents classic plays

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Producer Jonathan Hirsh and actor-director Ryan Seeley have formed a new theatrical production company whose mandate is to reinvent classic plays with an edgy and contemporary twist.

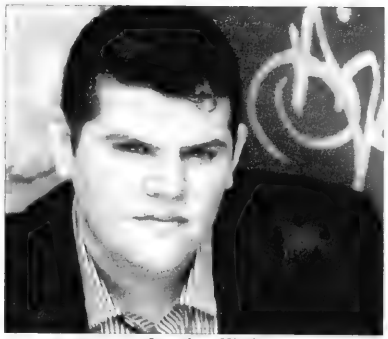
This summer, after they raised $35,000, their production company, Remain in Light Productions, produced its first two plays, House and Waiting for Godot, at The Paper Mill Theatre in Todmorden Mills in Toronto.

The duo met eight years ago while Hirsh was a student and Seeley his drama teacher at Metropolitan Preparatory Academy, a private school in Toronto.

"We were so sick of talking about it [starting a production company], I thought we'd better do it already, so I found funding for the show within three days, got the rights and found a theatre that was available for a month," Hirsh, 21, said. "Somehow it all magically [came together]– a star was following us so we got the show up."

Canadian playwright Daniel MacIvor's House is a one-man interactive play about Victor, a character who shares his tragic life story with the audience as he loses his grip on reality. Seeley, in the role of Victor, approaches his performance differently than MacIvor did.

"It's Ryan's personality that comes through," Hirsh said. "The pacing is much slower than MacIvor would do it, but that helps to bring the text forward and you understand the character of Victor, since timing, design and staging of the show influence what you receive from the text."



Jonathan Hirsh

Hirsh and Seeley set Samuel Beckett's Waiting for Godot in Nazi Germany and changed wealthy landowner Pozzo to a Nazi soldier.

"Because Pozzo's speech to his slave Lucky is based on harsh words – the way he speaks of humanity, we were inspired to look at his character as one of the most despicable people to land in our time," Hirsh said.

"It seems logical to make Lucky his Jewish slave so that's our recasting. That's part of the reason we set it in World War II. We know people are saying, 'Let's not let this [the Holocaust] happen again, let's not forget,' but every day you turn on the news and read of genocide – all over the world, it's happening.

"Also, we want to bring it to the consciousness of others, so our reasoning is based on the text, our research of Beckett's lifestyle and time in history," Hirsh says.

The entertainment business runs in Hirsh's family. His father, Michael, co-founded and ran one of Canada's largest animation companies, Nelvana, and his mother, writer-producer Elaine Waisglass, has been involved with CBC Radio and various television productions.

Hirsh has worked in improv productions as house manager for Bad Dog Theatre; a lighting assistant on the preschooler hit Doodlebops; and has toured with jazz musician DK Ibomeka throughout Canada and Europe as a lighting director. Last year, Hirsh and director Rodrigo Pizza created Ibomeka's music video Someone to Love Me.

Hirsh heads back to the California Institute of Arts this month to complete his bachelor of fine arts in design and production, and he plans to tour House and Waiting for Godot outside of Toronto while he and Seeley work on Remain In Light's 2009 season.

Yiddish tango wows Ashkenaz audience

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Zully Goldfarb

It's a fairly exotic blend, but it works.

Add a dollop of tango to a mix of Yiddish and you're ready to rock.

It would seem virtually impossible to integrate tango, that seductive dance style from Argentina, with Yiddish song classics from eastern Europe.

On reflection, however, they're compatible, since both are soulful and brimming with vitality.

Zully Goldfarb, a singer from Buenos Aires with a strong, clear voice and a pleasant stage manner, magically fused these diverse art forms in a tour de force of alchemy at the Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture last week.

In "An Evening of Yiddish Tango," Goldfarb, accompanied by three musicians and Toronto-based tango dancers Roxana and Fabian, wowed an audience, bringing it to its feet in a tangible expression of appreciation after she finished the last of her captivating songs.

Roxana and Fabian, a couple originally from Argentina, got things started and set the tone with an enticing tango number.

Fabian, clad in a black tuxedo with his jet black hair slicked back in 1930s Hollywood fashion, swept up Roxana, a suggestive slit in her dress, after a few stylized turns on the floor.

Goldfarb, her long golden red tresses trailing down her gown, belted out a medley of nostalgic Yiddish favourites from Nu shomele to Oign and Latin standards such as Los Mareados and Por Una Cabeza, always prolonging the sharp, distinctive Argentine Spanish "Rs."

Then, in a rousing demonstration of musical excellence, Pablo Saclis on the piano, Omar Massa on the bandoneon and Joseph Phillips on the contrabass delivered a rendition of pure, throbbing tango.

Roxana and Fabian returned for an encore their movements fluid and sensual in a whirl of close encounters, entwined legs and fast kisses.

Goldfarb, singing her heart out in Yiddish and Spanish, ended her performance with a hit parade of classics that included Papirosen, Balada Para Un Loco and Yiddishe Mama.

The encounter between Yiddish and tango certainly left an impression.

Amos Gitai was ready to explore new terrain

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For the past 28 years, in an unbroken chain of eature films and documentaries, Israeli director Amos Gitai has focused almost exclusively on arious aspects of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

In films ranging from Kippur to Kedma, he as turned his sharp gaze on Israel's "reality," its ngoing struggle with the Arabs in general and the alestinians in particular.

But a few years ago, after receiving a phone all from the head of a major television station France, where he lives part of the year, Gitai witched gears.

Jerome Clement, president of Arte France, had ritten a novel, Plus Tard, Tu Comprendras, a omage to his Jewish mother and her Russian-orn parents who had been murdered during the olocaust, and he wanted Gitai to read his book the hope that it might be transferred to the big reen.

Clement appreciated Gitai's intellectual ap-roach to cinema and knew that he was the son an architect who had been raised in Berlin and d settled in Palestine after leaving Germany in e late 1930s.

Gitai was certainly ready to explore new rrain. "I said to myself, 'I'd like to speak about e Diaspora.'"

And so Gitai agreed to make Plus Tard, Tu omprendras, which had its North American but last week at the Toronto International Film estival.

The 89-minute film, starring renowned French actress Jeanne Moreau, takes place as the 1987 Klaus Barbie war crimes trial unfolds. It deals with such interlocking themes as identity and memory and revolves around a Jewish woman married to a Catholic man who prefers not to discuss the past.

In an interview on the first day of the festival, considered one of the world's top three, Gitai said he was not exactly unfamiliar with the topic.

Gitai, who turns 58 on Oct. 11, visited Paris when he was 17 and stayed with one of his father's friends.

"I remember a dinner when a French historian was present," he writes in a director's statement. "The historian began a defence of Marshall Henri Petain, the chief of state of Vichy France, explaining that he acted like a real patriot because it had been impossible to directly oppose the Germans without risking the destruction of the country. According to him, Petain's collaboration had been intelligent and efficient."

Gitai was shocked by his views. "The fate of the Jews had absolutely no place in his reasoning. He saw everything from the point of view of France and the French, completely excluding French Jews."

That visit to Paris in 1967 informed Gitai's vision as he shot Plus Tard, Tu Comprendras, a Franco-German production, in 2007.

"Clement's story allows for the exploration of the relationship that the French have with their past, especially since his paternal family was Catholic and his mother's family were immigrant Jews," he writes.

Gitai believes that France has yet to fully come to terms with its complicit role in the Holocaust, during which more than 75,000 Jews were deported and killed.

And although he thinks that France is no longer in denial about its co-operation with the Nazis, the Holocaust remains an open wound on France's body politic.

The film, which has also been screened at festivals in Berlin and Locarno, is scheduled to be aired in January 2009 on French television.

He has no idea whether Plus Tard, Tu Comprendras – whose quiet power envelopes a viewer – will enjoy mass appeal. "No director can answer that question, and it would be pretentious of me to even try."

Amos Gitai

An architect by profession who was born in Haifa, Gitai is more popular abroad than in Israel.

"In general, when you make strong films, your country of origin has problems stomaching them, and I understand this," he said.

Gitai turned to filmmaking after being wounded in the 1973 Yom Kippur War. He was flying in a Bell helicopter on the Golan Heights, a member of a rescue crew, when it was hit by a Syrian missile and its co-pilot was decapitated. The near-death incident left him with a deep desire to make documentaries.

In 1983, he left Israel after Field Diary, his critique of Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, was partially censored by the military. For the next decade, he lived and worked abroad, making films ranging from Bangkok-Bahrain to Queen Mary, documentaries about low-paid Asian labourers and a famous cruise ship, respectively.

He returned to Israel after the election of Yitzhak Rabin and the launching of the Oslo peace process.

Gitai, whose daughter and son have served in the Israeli armed forces, maintains that no topic should be taboo to filmmakers in Israel.

"Every subject should be legitimate," he said. "It's a sign of a self-confident society."

Gitai, who describes Israel as "a successful high-tech power," said that the Israeli film industry has progressed now that more government funds are available to producers and directors.

He singled out two Israeli films that have impressed him of late: Beaufort, which deals with Israel's presence in southern Lebanon, and Children of the Sun, which documents the first generation of Israelis who spent their formative years on kibbutzim.

Gitai's next film, titled The Seven Miracles and starring a cast of Israeli actors, is based on his late mother's trove of letters. Born in Palestine, she was the descendant of Russian Jews who arrived in the country in the early 1900s.

"She was a great letter writer," he noted, saying that her dispatches chart the transformation of a society and a person.

Gitai is also working on a thriller to be set in Israel.

Kollek's thoughtful film examines alienation, identity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The accomplished Israeli actor Moshe Ivgy is at the centre of Amos Kollek's thoughtful film, Restless, which is set in New York City and Israel.

Ivgy, grizzled and dishevelled, plays Moshe Amar, a down-at-the-heels, disillusioned Israeli of Moroccan origin who sells watches, jewelry and trinkets by day and who recites free-verse poetry at night.

Subsisting on the periphery of society, Moshe dwells in a dark, gloomy apartment that serves as an apt metaphor for his state of mind. He is alienated from his roots, though he remains a patriot at heart, and he has not seen his 21-year-old son since he abandoned him and his mother.

It's not entirely clear why Moshe left Israel, but if it was for fortune or fame, he has found neither in the United States.

In Restless, which will be screened at the Toronto International Film Festival on Thursday, Sept. 11, at 6:15 p.m. and again on Saturday, Sept. 13, at 1:45 p.m., Kollek skillfully builds up Moshe's character as he delves into such related themes as alienation and identity.

And if there's one actor who has the ability to articulate a whole range of emotions, it's Ivgy, whose sad-sack appearance is an immediate tip-off that not all is right in the world.

The film, with a running time of 100 minutes, opens as thugs nearly beat Moshe to a pulp. "This is for your jewelry empire," shouts one of the hoodlums sarcastically as he lands a punch.

Judging by the trouble he has gotten himself into, Moshe is something of a shady character, a loser who is three months behind in his rent and a man in mourning after having heard that his wife has just died.

Having set up his New York scenes, Kollek segues to Israel, where Moshe's son, Tzach (Ran Danker), is a sniper in an elite army unit. A cool-headed fellow, his job is to assassinate Palestinian terrorists.

He disposes of one terrorist with a clean shot to the body, but his hopes of becoming a career soldier dissolve in an instant when his rifle accidentally discharges and hits a Palestinian bystander.

Back in New York City, Moshe is drawn to Yolanda (Karen Young), an attractive but hardbitten bartender who works in the club where he performs.

A single mother, Yolanda is initially repelled by Moshe, but as time passes, she learns to value his better side, and romance blooms.

Through Moshe, Kollek delivers a brief but telling commentary on Israel's occupation of the West Bank and a bittersweet observation about contemporary Israel.

Kollek, the son of a former mayor of Jerusalem, ties up loose ends by fleshing out Moshe's evolving relationship with his estranged son.

Tzach visits New York City and finally meets his dad. Tension flares, but father and son chart a route to reconciliation through one of Moshe's hearty, home-cooked soups.

What could be more Jewish?

Israeli pop group Hakol Over Habibi reunites

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the CJN

WINNIPEG — After many years, one of the most successful Israeli pop groups of the 1970s and '80s has reunited.

Hakol Over Habibi is a four-person vocal group led by Shlomit Aharon, plus accompanying musicians. They recently stopped in Winnipeg as part of a Canadian tour, after a well-received May concert in Vancouver.

The concert in Winnipeg, in June, was lively and light-hearted. At times the vocalists were reminiscent of the American group Manhattan Transfer, who sing catchy pop and jazz tunes and produce beautiful harmonies. Aharon's rich voice was well supported by the group's three male singers.

"Hakol Over Habibi is a strange animal," says Aharon, who was born in 1950 and lives in Tel Aviv. "We are rare in that we started performing together in the late 1970s, and we performed many American songs. We did a lot of parodies.

"We performed American hits from the '60s and '70s, including Elvis' hits. But we didn't just sing the songs – we performed them as parodies. Now, after we all went our own separate ways and did our own thing for many years, we decided to reunite and are having a lot of fun performing again."

In 1981, Habibi was chosen to represent Israel in the Eurovision contest and placed seventh for the song Halaila.

It's not an accident that the group performs some of Naomi Shemer's most beautiful songs, including Jerusalem of Gold and Al Kol Elah for Diaspora Jewish audiences.

"Naomi Shemer wrote several songs specifically for our group, including Oreach and Hagiga Nigmeret, which we performed in Winnipeg. Every word in her songs has relevance," Aharon says.

Early in Aharon's career, Shemer suggested she change her Polish surname – Devinik. "My father's name was Aharon. Naomi Shemer suggested changing my last name to Aharon, a name which sounds like it is Sephardic. Changing my name to a Sephardic-sounding one probably helped my career in Israel."

For Israel's 60th birthday in May, Habibi performed in Moscow. "It was really exciting. There were thousands of Jewish people there, and I had a real sense of doing shlichut," says Aharon, who has two daughters, age 26 and 21.

After Habibi broke up, Aharon launched a solo career and recorded the solo albums To Love More and Come and See. She also made an album titled Duet with Yevgeni Shapovalov, an Israeli opera singer of Russian Jewish descent.

"My first time coming to Winnipeg was with Yevgeni four years ago for a JNF [Jewish National Fund] gala concert. I also came back last year for the JNF as part of five female singers called the Divas," Aharon says.

Habibi singer Ami Mandelman, who is of Polish Jewish background, says that he finds it exciting to perform in the Diaspora. "I'm excited by the idea of seeing the Jewish nation, in different parts of the world."

Mandelman sings a rendition of the oldie Smoke Gets in Your Eyes during the group's shows. "When we perform in the Diaspora, we try to do a mix of Hebrew and English numbers, including more recent tunes and some oldies," he says.

"In the years when Habibi wasn't performing, I went on my own direction, doing voice-overs in the film industry," says Mandelman, who lives in Herzylia. His voice is the one that is used in the Israeli version of Shrek. "That's my claim to fame," he adds.

Kiki Rotstein, who is of Jewish, Italian and Polish ancestry is the producer and manager of the group, and is one of its four singers, as well. "But I don't sing with any other group, as my main role is producing Habibi's shows," he says.

In 2008, Habibi released a double live CD titled Shlomit Aharon and Habibi in Concert 2007.

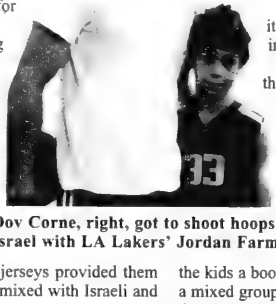
Canadian participates in hoops peace program with NBA's Farmar

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

KIRYAT GAT, Israel — Nine-year-old Winnipegger Dov Corne had the thrill of a lifetime when he took part in a special basketball clinic last month conducted by the Los Angeles Lakers' Jordan Farmar for Israeli and Palestinian children.

The clinic was part of a "Twinned Peace Sports Schools" program organized by the Shimon Peres Center for Peace.

Corne, this writer's son, along with Israeli and Palestinian children, played with the 21-year-old Lakers point guard, who is the only Jewish player in the NBA. Farmar, who doesn't speak either Hebrew or Arabic, communicated with the children using basketball as a common language.



Dov Corne, right, got to shoot hoops in Israel with LA Lakers' Jordan Farmar.

The Palestinian children arrived from Jericho and Tulkarm and the Israeli children from Kiryat Gat. All the kids wore identical red jerseys provided them by the Peres Center. Each team was mixed with Israeli and Palestinian children.

Corne, who speaks Hebrew, sat with the Israeli children at the opening of the clinic, which was designed to promote teamwork and co-operation and help teach the benefits of coexistence.

"We are happy to have Dov come today to see the work we are doing to try to allow Israelis and Palestinians to get to know the other side, to break down barriers, and to foster an atmosphere of reconciliation," said Israeli coach Shachar Elyakim, who has been involved in this unique program for the past five years. "The idea is that all kids can try to learn to play together. The kids find a way to communicate with each other. They give each other high fives."

Corne was included in the program after the Peres Center was contacted and told that Dov badly wanted to meet Farmar.

When Farmar saw that Corne didn't have a red jersey, since he was not a regular member of the program, he handed Corne the jersey the Peres Center had made for him.

"Thank you," Corne said, "but I can't wear it because it's much too long and I can't run in it."

At the outset of the clinic, Farmar, who is the son of a Jewish mother and an African-American father, told the children, "We're going to have fun today… I've come a long way to spend time with you guys.

"I think it's really beautiful that all of you guys can come together here to play."

Farmar's comments were translated simultaneously into Hebrew and Arabic by Palestinian and Israeli coaches.

"Having Jordan Farmar here gives the kids a boost of confidence. It means that heroes support a mixed group [of Israelis and Palestinians]. All of the children wear the same red jerseys, and when you mix them up on teams, you really can't tell who's who," Elyakim said.

Corne had the opportunity to shoot baskets with the talented Jericho-born coach Ferris Sweetie, a Palestinian who lives in Ramallah and teaches basketball at a private American institution in both Ramallah and Jerusalem.

"The kids come here to see friends and make friends," said Sweetie, who hugged the Israeli coach when he arrived.

Sweetie, who speaks English and some Hebrew in addition to Arabic, has been in the program for five years. "I have made friends in Israel and I come to Tel Aviv quite often to go to the beach. There isn't a beach near where I live. I sometimes come for Shabbat to be with friends. I usually don't have any problem crossing the checkpoints," he said.

Michal Rubin of the Peres Center said, "We see our work here as starting to prepare the groundwork for a real peace that will occur at the political level one day."

He added: "The situation can be complex. Parents of the children in some of the Palestinian communities are sometimes scared to send their kids to activities we have in Sderot. This kind of flips the situation on its head."

At the end of the clinic, Farmar told the children, "Today you played together and that's a start to finding a solution to the problems in the Middle East. Today you learned basketball skills together. If you keep working on them, you will get better. It's the same in life. If you keep working on your relationships, things will get better."

Schachter wins national beach volleyball title

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sam Schachter culminated a summer of storybook finishes with yet another last minute nail-biter, pairing with Rex Fenton to win a gold medal in the 18-and-under category at the 2008 Beach National Championships.

In the third game of a three-game set against the Number 1 seeds, Manitobans Chris Voth and Dane Pischke, Schachter and Fenton erased a 7-2 deficit and won 15-13 to claim the title.

Their road to the final was equally fraught with difficulty. In the semi, it took a last set 15-13 win to advance to the championship match.

The tournament, held at Toronto's Ashbridge's Bay Park, capped a pretty good summer, Sam's dad, Jon, said. A few weeks before at the Ontario Summer Games in Ottawa, Sam won another gold in the "King of the Court" event. Sam teamed with a variety of players and accumulated more points than any other beach volleyballer to win that event, Jon said.

Earlier, at Volleyball Canada's tryouts for the national team in June, Schachter and Fenton were again pushed to the limit by their nemeses, Voth and Pischke. After losing the first set 12-21, they were almost eliminated in Game 2 of the best-of-three championship, trailing the westerners 20-19. Despite facing three match points, they staved off elimination and went on to win 26-24, forcing a Game 3. They won that one 15-10.

Sam won pretty well every beach tournament he entered in his age division this season, Jon said. He and Fenton even won one in an under-21 event.

With the beach volleyball season now over, Sam has moved on to Wilfred Laurier University on a volleyball scholarship. He will play for the school's court team, Jon said. Next season will present some difficult choices for Sam. He's locked up a spot on the Maccabi Canada court volleyball team, which will compete in Israel next summer.

Marrying for love

I consider myself kinda jaded when it comes to love, but recently I witnessed something that made me believe that some people really do still get married for the right reason.

In France, when a couple gets married, they must have a civil ceremony as well as a religious one. My 27-year-old cousin, Vanessa, who I consider more like a sister and friend, made everyone laugh when she answered the civil official who asked her if she would honour her husband by marrying him.

"I do!" she yelled with much enthusiasm and pride. Her husband, Damien, just as eager and excited, also answered with a resounding yes.

Anyone who meets this couple for the first time always asks the same thing: "Honeymooners?"

The truth is, Vanessa and Damien, who have been dating for three years, have always acted like honeymooners, so in love and so thrilled to be in each other's presence. Even when they get angry with each other, their words are soft and their intention of working things out is never questioned. Not once have I heard either of them voice any doubt about being together.

But it wasn't until I heard what the civil official at the ceremony said that I began to realize how precious true love is. Especially these days.

"I meet with couples all the time before they get married, and I always ask them the same thing. 'Why?,'" the official told the crowd. "I've heard all the reasons – they have children together, financial security, tax breaks… but when I asked Vanessa and Damien, their answer was simple – 'Because we love each other, why else?'"

Vanessa and I have always been the romantics, but lately I've lost some of that magic. Even as I write this, I contemplate changing the word "magic" to "innocence," as if it's childlike for us to believe in such things as romance.

However, I've been inspired and so maybe I'll hold on to that magic for a little while longer.

I don't think it's unusual for twentysomethings to lose some of their romantic notions about love. After all, this is the time when we begin to realize the realities around us. The marriages we grew accustomed to as children have likely dissolved in divorce. Stories of betrayal have replaced the stories of enchantment. Even our fantasy life has changed. Instead of storybook endings on TV, we're bombarded with reality shows in which love is destined to be doomed from the start. It's really no wonder that when it comes to marriage we start settling for reasons of convenience rather than love.

But then again, isn't it safer for us to be cynical when it comes to matters of the heart? Shouldn't we set aside the emotion and look at the situation rationally?

When someone asks me what I'm looking for when it comes to love, I often think back to the season finale of Sex and the City, when Carrie breaks it off with her boyfriend, telling him she needs an "inconvenient, can't live without you" kind of love. When I first heard that, I understood her and agreed with her completely. Now I have to wonder if that kind of crazy love is sustainable.

I'd like to think so. I'd like to think it's the passion and love that make a marriage work and not matters of convenience. I'm sure the wise ones would tell me it's a little bit of both. Looking at Vanessa and Damien, I have to believe that while both are surely important, only one truly matters the most.

A Family Business for over 50 Years

Dear Ella,

Last week, my husband Adam came home in the late afternoon after spending the day with his friend, Len. This guy is not someone we socialize with as a couple, so I was surprised when Len came in the house, as we were running late for an early evening event.

Adam came in to tell me that Len just wanted to freshen up a bit. Almost 20 minutes later, I started to wonder where this guy was, so I got up to look down the hall, only to find the guest bathroom empty.

About Life

I was livid when I found out that he had gone through our bedroom and into our private en suite bathroom to "freshen up." Adam was shocked as well, but he begged me not to make a scene. I was fit to be tied, since I had personal items both in my bedroom and en suite that are right out in the open. It was all I could do to contain my anger. Was I out of line to be upset about this?

Invasion of Privacy

Dear Invasion of Privacy

Everyone has a right to privacy. A master bedroom en suite is one of those "off limits" places that most people respect when entering someone's home.

This is a form of intrusion, which we might define as something that is offensive or objectionable to a reasonable person. I think this fits the bill.

Why would Len choose to use your private en suite over a guest bathroom? The only things I can come up with are size, amenities (such as a shower that may not be in a guest bathroom) or just plain nosiness. Whatever the reason, it was rude and disrespectful for Len to enter your private area without, at the very least, asking for your permission.

I understand Adam's request for you not to make a scene, but now the ball is in Adam's court to make sure that this never happens again. He needs to talk to his friend and let him know how inappropriate this was, or not bring him back into your home.

Life comes with unspoken boundaries, and most people know how to respect those boundaries. Once in a while, you will come across an anomaly that doesn't fit the mould. This guy was obviously absent the day they discussed etiquette rules.

You were not out of line to be upset, but it's over now, and I'm sure Adam won't let this happen again. Put it behind you.

I love September. It's a fresh, clean slate, and ere is something about the first day back to hool, or even for people going back to work ter Labour Day, that really spells new beginnings. lso, September is the month of our Jewish New ear. What a perfect time to set realistic goals bout what we want to achieve in e months and year ahead.

A great way to start with children to sit down with each one and ask em what they want to accomplish the new year. Write your back--school goals down, because I always say, writing them down not only akes them happen, but as teacher and author al Urban says so aptly, "goals are dreams with eadlines."

Remember everything begins with a plan, so hether it's a project or book report for a child or nuge memo or report for an adult, make a plan d stick to it. Create an overall intention or goal what you want to accomplish and then break down into steps. Give yourself a date it has to finished by and tell someone you are going to finish it by that date, so that you have someone to be accountable to.

In a work environment, give everyone a chance to talk about what is working and what is not, so that people feel listened to, acknowledged and supported. This is also effective with children. Have a family meeting once a week, at which everyone can talk about their highs, achievements, best moments of the week and what they found challenging, so they can get the validation and support from the whole group

When it comes to defining goals, I love the wheel of life, which I have talked about many times in this column. The categories are career; money; education; travel; significant other; friends; family; health and fitness; your environment; fun and recreation; and personal growth.

So for instance, ask yourself what fitness goals you would like to achieve and what steps you will take to achieve them.

For the family wedge in the wheel, ask yourself how you want to parent and what is one thing you could change to create more time for yourself and your family?

The same applies to your environment or to the artistic or creative goals that you want to achieve, as well as how you intend to give back to the community and to the world.

My favourite exercise to do with clients is called the GROW model: G is for Goal; R for Reality; O for Options; and W for Will.

So for every Goal, questions to ask yourself are: what is the goal you would like to achieve and when do you want to achieve it by.

Reality is your present situation, which is holding you back from moving forward. What resources do you need to move forward and where can you get them?

For Options, ask yourself what your choices are and the different ways you could approach this.

For Will, ask yourself what you will do, when will you start, and what obstacles you face and how you will overcome them.

As Urban says in his book Life's Greatest Lessons, "goals are the starting blocks of motivation. They help us to take charge of our own lives. Goals give us a destination and a sense of purpose."

Also, remember the difference between a goal and a wish. A wish is airy fairy, a dream we hope happens to us. A goal is something we make happen. It requires hard work, determination, discipline, motivation and a plan.

Write down 25 goals you have for the year ahead or do The 100 things I Want to Accomplish in my Lifetime List. Keep them in a journal and refer to them often. Remember, each time we achieve a goal, we feel more confident about what is possible and what is available to us, which leads to more goals and then successes become even more possible.

So my goal is to wish you all a happy and healthy New Year and to hope that all of your goals come true for you in this upcoming year!

Carpenters hammer fellow unions

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Canada Council of Carpenters last week unanimously endorsed a "historic" resolution that rejected descriptions of Israel as an apartheid state while calling for an end to threats of boycott and divestment.

The union, which represents 60,000 workers nationwide, also explicitly criticized other labour organizations that have attempted "to undermine the legitimacy of Israel's democracy."

The resolution, headed "Support for Israel and peace in the Middle East," was passed by approximately 200 delegates in Victoria last week at the union's biennial convention. It was drafted by the Carpenters' District Council of Ontario and was consistent with the union's history of adopting "progressive" positions on public issues, said Steven Del Duca, director of public affairs for the Carpenters.

Resolution on Israel rejects apartheid label, boycott calls

"We felt it was important for the union to take a balanced and progressive stand, both with regards Israel and the peace process," he said.

The one-page resolution states that the carpenters' union "supports Israel in its struggle to maintain peace and democracy," and urges "an immediate and peaceful resolution between Israel and the Palestinians resulting in a two-state solution."

It also calls for "a recognition that Israel has the right to exist and to defend itself and its people, an immediate end of hostilities towards Israel by various groups, including Hamas and Hezbollah... Iran and Syria."

It parts company with other labour groups in urging "an immediate end to the mislabelling of Israel as as apartheid state and a cessation of threats to boycott and divest from the state of Israel."

In recent years, other unions, particularly those representing public service workers, have employed strong language in attacking Israel.

Dead Sea Scrolls coming to Toronto

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Dead Sea Scrolls are coming to Toronto for the first time next June for a six-month exhibit at the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM).

Ya'en Vered, who arrived in Toronto earlier this month to begin a three-year shlichut for the Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA), is setting up an office here in the hope of establishing a presence in Canada by making the IAA more accessible and building bridges with the Diaspora using Israel's ancient history.

The IAA, which, until 1990, was the Israeli government's Department of Antiquities, is the leading professional body for the study of archeology in Israel. It handles antiquity sites, antiquity treasures, excavation, preservation, and conservation.

Vered said he has many ideas to arouse the interests of Canadians, but perhaps the most exciting development is the upcoming exhibit that will bring the Dead Sea Scrolls to the ROM for the first time.

Although the IAA announced last month that it is working on a five-year project to post images of the scrolls on the Internet to make them more accessible to scientists and the general public, the unique opportunity to see them in person is sure to draw crowds when they go on display in June.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Corrie in the Capital

OTTAWA — The controversial play My Name Is Rachel Corrie, based on the diaries of a young American pro-Palestinian activist who was killed by an Israeli army bulldozer in Gaza in 2003, was staged in Ottawa from Sept. 10 to 20 at the Arts Court Theatre. Other productions of the play have already run in Vancouver, Montreal Calgary and Toronto, and the play has also been staged in Los Angeles, New York and London, England. The Ottawa production was staged by Vision Theatre, a small, alternative company. Corrie, 23, was killed while trying to stop the demolition of Palestinian homes. An Israeli army investigation ruled her death accidental.

Cleanup Continues

TORONTO — Mount Sinai Cemetery is slowly getting back to normal after a building and 20 gravestones were damaged by last month's explosion at neighbouring Sunrise Propane, cemetery president Neil Cohen says. The cemetery's hall, although not ready to be used, is being repaired, while fallen monuments have been righted and estimates on stone repairs are being done, Cohen said. Funerals and unveilings are now taking place as usual, he added.

WORLD

Birthright Gets Gift

NEW YORK — The Adelson Family Foundation has pledged another $30 million (US) to the Birthright Israel Foundation. Casino mogul Sheldon Adelson and his wife, Miriam, have now contributed nearly $100 million over the past two years to the foundation that funds Birthright. The latest pledge is a $20-million gift for 2009 and $10 million for 2010.

Sweet Home Alabama

DOTHAN, Ala. — A Jewish group in Alabama is offering up to $50,000 to Jewish families that relocate to its town. Blumberg Family Jewish Community Services wants to repopulate the Jewish community of Dothan, a largely Christian town of 58,000. Families that stay for five years and become active in the local shul don't have to repay the grant. Southern U.S. states have recently seen a growth in Jewish population, and some 386,000 Jews live in the region. But trends show young people moving to large cities such as Atlanta. The program has advertised in Jewish newspapers in the U.S. Northeast and Miami, Associated Press reported.

Marriage Affirmed

NEW YORK — American Orthodox Jewish and Catholic leaders have issued a joint statement affirming a "shared commitment" to traditional marriage. Noting rising calls to legalize same-sex marriage, the statement says traditional marriage "is of critical importance to the furtherance of a fundamental societal interest." Rabbi Fabian Schonfeld, head of the OU/RCA joint committee on inter-religious affairs, and Bishop William Murphy, of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, signed the document.

Swastikas Found

WASHINGTON — Several swastikas were found Sept. 6 painted on homes in Rockville, Md., a Washington suburb that's home to many Israelis. Police are investigating the vandalism as a hate crime. It came a few months after Israeli children were assaulted nearby, Ha'aretz reported.

Israeli Hacker Arrested in Canada

CALGARY — A notorious Israeli hacker living in Canada was arrested in Montreal earlier this month on suspicion of committing online fraud to the tune of $1.8 million.

Calgary police suspect Ehud Tenenbaum and three others hacked into the database of a Calgary financial services firm last December. They then changed the value of debit cards to an amount higher than their face value.

Investigators are now working to confirm whether Tenenbaum, 29, of Montreal, is the same Ehud Tenenbaum who became known some 10 years ago as "the Analyzer" after hacking into computers belonging to the Pentagon, NASA and the Knesset. He was tried in Israel and sentenced to 18 months in prison, of which he served eight.

In recent years, he ran a horse farm and served as a consultant for IT security companies.

The four suspects were arrested in Montreal and brought to Calgary on Sept. 9. Tenenbaum has been charged with six counts of fraudulent use of credit card data and one count of fraud over $5,000. He is the only one of the four suspects who remains in custody.

Harper addresses Jewish crowd in Toronto

PM says he'll be voice for 'democracy and rule of law' in the Middle East

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Speaking to a predominantly Jewish crowd at a rally in the mid-town Toronto riding of Eglinton-Lawrence last week, Prime Minister Stephen Harper focused on his pro-Israel record and suggested that only his Conservative party will truly look out for Israel's interests.

Citing a day he remembers as politically "awkward" at the 2006 Francophonie summit, Harper recalled how, despite pressure from the international community, he refused to sign a resolution that chastised Israel for the Second Lebanon War and for what he described as "having defended its democracy" against Hezbollah, "an organization that wants [Israel] wiped from the face of the Earth."

"I did not sign it, and I will not sign it," Harper said to wild applause. "I found myself caught in the centre of a case of political correctness gone mad. What do you think [the opposition leaders] would have done under that kind of pressure at the Francophonie? Do you really know where our opponents stand?"

Harper then recalled an occasion in 2006 when various members of the opposition parties took part in a pro-Lebanon demonstration in Montreal, at which Hezbollah flags were on prominent display.

Tribute to Emil Fackenheim

From the editor's desk

Five years ago, in the early morning of Friday, Sept. 19, 2003 (22 Elul), Emil Fackenheim passed away in Jerusalem. He was 87.

Without a doubt, he was one of the great thinkers, specifically one of the great Jewish thinkers of modern times. Scholars, philosophers and theologians will study his works for centuries to come.

In this column last week, Prof. James E. Diamond of Waterloo University commented that Fackenheim had been one of the key transformative influences in his life. The list must be very long indeed of individuals, scholars and lay people alike, who owe a special debt of mentorship, friendship and inspiration to the late Prof. Fackenheim.

Tributes to Emil Fackenheim from two such individuals – Allan Gould and Robert Eli Rubinstein – appear in the paper today on pages 9 and 21 respectively. As befitting the unique, direct, even tender way in which Fackenheim affected people, the tributes are very personal, and thus, all the more poignant.

Ten years before he died, Fackenheim began to write his memoirs. He was working on the final proofs when he died.

The book, An Epitaph for German Judaism: From Halle to Jerusalem, (The University of Wisconsin Press, 2007), was published last year. His friend and colleague, Prof. Michael Morgan, completed the final emendations. On Morgan's part, it was, in the very fullest sense, a labour of devotion and love.

As the title suggests, and as Fackenheim makes clear, the book is more than an autobiography – it is a profoundly moving reflection on the fate of German Judaism.

He begins his story in Halle, Germany, where he was raised, and leads us with unconcealed vulnerability and emotion through the inevitable melancholy moments of a life lived through the terror of the Holocaust. Of course, he also leads us through the many other stops and stations in the path of his life, introducing us to family, friends, teachers, colleagues and numerous others.

He wrote the story as he spoke: precisely, carefully, conveying finely tuned, nuanced meanings to thoughts and observations. Fackenheim was a master of language, and a superb story teller.

As one reads the text, the memory of Fackenheim's raspy, accented, mellow voice – for those who actually heard him speak – narrates the drama. And Fackenheim does this with his characteristically wry but pointed sense of humour.

As was also his manner, Fackenheim is unabashedly forthright in putting forward his views on pulpit politics, especially politics and policies concerning Israel.

Many commentaries have already appeared regarding Fackenheim's thought and work. Many more are on the way.

One collection of essays that was published just after Fackenheim's memoir appeared was Emil L. Fackenheim: A Jewish Philosopher's Response to the Holocaust, by David Patterson, (Syracuse University Press, 2008).

Patterson, like so many people, a colleague, student and friend, deftly places Fackenheim in a broader context in the development of western thought. He describes Fackenheim as "the one German Jewish philosopher who, unlike the rest, devoted 35 of his years to wrestling with the Angel of Murder manifest in the annihilation of European Jewry. Among the German Jewish philosophers who lived through the horror of Nazi Germany, Fackenheim alone assumed the impossible task of responding to the Nazi annihilation of the Jews of Europe at the hands of murderers versed in German philosophy."

According to Patterson, after Auschwitz, despite Auschwitz one should add, Fackenheim heard "the deafening cry of a Commanding Voice." He referred, of course, to the famous 614th Commandment to the Jewish people that Fackenheim proposed humbly, yet boldly, too, as a theological as well as a national obligation. For readers unfamiliar with Fackenheim's 614th Commandment, I reproduce Patterson's brief excerpt of it.

"Jews are forbidden to hand Hitler posthumous victories. They are commanded to survive as Jews, lest the Jewish people perish. They are commanded to remember… They are forbidden to despair of man and this world…They are forbidden to despair of the God of Israel, lest Judaism perish… A Jew may not respond to Hitler's attempt to destroy Judaism by himself co-operating in its destruction."

There are no last words to be written about Emil Fackenheim. His works and and thought will be studied for years and years to come. But the last words of this column are appropriately those of Allan Gould: "The future of the Jews and Judaism was everything to him."

And for this, we will be forever grateful.

May the memory of Emil Ludwig Fackenheim be for blessing.

SeeJN CELEBRATING 60 YEARS OF ISRAEL

FOR THE SAKE OF REACHING PEACE

On Sept. 12, 2005, all the Jewish communities in Gaza were officially handed over to the Palestinian Authority. The unilateral evacuation of the communities in Gaza (Gush Katif) began on Aug. 15 of that year and was completed Aug. 24. Four communities in the northern West Bank were also unilaterally evacuated. After the last Israeli soldiers left Gaza, Palestinians looted and destroyed the communities' synagogues, and even the hothouses that had been purchased for them by Jewish philanthropists. Here, soldiers are seen erecting a new border sign at the community of Kissufim.

Durban II prep conference called a concern

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A draft document circulating at the United Nations suggests human rights violators will get off the hook at the upcoming Durban II anti-racism conference in Geneva while Israel will again come in for special opprobrium, and the West – including its fundamental respect for free speech – will come under attack, said Hillel Neuer, executive director of UN Watch.

The discussion paper, titled the Preliminary Document of the African Regional Conference Preparatory to the Durban Review Conference, was crafted at a recent gathering in Abuja, Nigeria. The meeting was held to study Africans' efforts at addressing racism while highlighting areas of continuing concern on the continent.

The document, however, referred to only one nation by name – the Palestinians – and only in the context of their suffering foreign occupation and a violation of their human rights. In the context of Durban II – the followup to the 2001 UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa – it suggests Israel is practising racism, which is a repeat of the old Zionism-is-racism accusation, Neuer said.

Neuer, who has been scathing in his critique of the UN's Human Rights Council, said several serious situations in Africa were ignored, including atrocities in Darfur, "xenophobic" conflict in South Africa that killed dozens, and 1,000 people killed in Kenya "in inter-tribal massacres."

At the United Nations, the "spin" about the Abuja meeting was that "it's a big anti-racism review conference. It was nothing of the sort. Not a single human rights violation in Africa was mentioned, of which there are many," Neuer said. Instead, the transatlantic slave trade and colonialism were highlighted.

What's more, a disturbing paragraph was inserted that threatened longstanding notions of free speech, he said.

The problematic clause is Paragraph 13, which "calls upon states to avoid inflexibly clinging to free speech in defiance of the sensitivities existing in a society and with absolute disregard for religious feelings."

"It's an intolerable dismissal of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948 for free speech," Neuer said in a telephone interview from Geneva. "Free speech is a great value in any democracy. It's not a pretext for anything."

Paragraph 13 is part of a concerted effort "to impose anti-blasphemy restrictions, under the term 'defamation of religion.'" He said there is no such concept in international law, but the Organization of the Islamic Conference, an umbrella group representing 56 Muslim countries, is in the middle of "a campaign against the liberal democratic concept of free speech and attempting to impose an Islamic standard for blasphemy."

While UN resolutions can't be enforced in western countries such as Canada, they can have a long-term impact on judges and human rights legal institutions, Neuer said, adding that Canada's human rights commissions appear to have been affected by this line of thinking.

"Legal discourse is poisoned and corroded by these sham concepts. I think it's deeply disturbing what's happening in Canada," he said. (One complaint launched by Canadian Muslims targeted the defunct Western Standard magazine for publishing Danish cartoons depicting the Muslim prophet Muhammad.)

Two other developments at the UN Human Rights Council are also grounds for concern, Neuer added. The next pre-Durban II review conference will focus on Asia, and "Iran is a major player at that meeting."

In addition, the debut speech to the UN Human Rights Council by Navanethem Pillay, the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, was troubling, he said. Not only did it praise the Abuja conference but it criticized western democracies for either withdrawing from Durban II or for avoiding preparatory meetings.

Neuer said that "the threat of no western participation is the best thing that every happened to Durban II. Without that, there would be much worse things in the [Africa] document."

He also took issue with a reference in Pillay's speech that alleged the "conference process has been the subject of ferocious, and often distorted, criticism by certain lobby groups focused on single issues."

"I've never seen such nasty language coming from the UN human rights office," Neuer said. "It seemed quite malicious.

He added that the "depiction of unnamed lobby groups that criticize Durban II process – groups focused on single issues – was a thinly veiled reference to Jewish or Jewish-affiliated organizations. The statement was intended to conjure up xenophobic and stereotypical image of the 'Jewish lobby,' with its frightful allusion to shadowy organizations who level 'distorted' criticism, conduct themselves in a 'ferocious' manner, and who, rather than being committed to universal and shared principles, are selfishly 'focused on single issues.'"

The statement "play[ed] on imagery reminiscent of that which circulated in Durban in 2001... and intended to discredit and delegitimize those who raise questions about the abuses in the Durban II process," the letter stated.

UN Watch wrote to the High Commission asking that the statement be retracted.

Eph Diamond z"l built family and community

Eph Diamond z"l with wife Shirley

Cadillac Development founder helped build Toronto

By Daniel Horowitz

Few men have left as indelible a mark on the city of Toronto – and many of its citizens - as the late A. Ephraim (Eph) Diamond.

Diamond, the driving force in building the Cadillac Development Corporation (later Cadillac Fairview) into one of North America's leading real estate companies, and named an Officer of the Order of Canada in 1994, passed away on September 4.

Eph's contribution to the fabric of Canada – both personally and professionally - was punctuated by his 1988 induction into the Canadian Business Hall of Fame; his 1980 Human Relations Award from the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews and the 1979 State of Israel Prime Minister's Medal for Humanitarian Services.

Not bad for a fellow who, when attending Queen's University as a student, boasted one pair of pants in his entire wardrobe. He knew what it was to go without, and it's a lesson he clearly never forgot.

"You could tell that the spirit and enthusiasm with which Eph approached his business was how he also approached his family," said Toronto Mayor David Miller, who attended Eph's funeral. "He was not only a tremendous family man, but he was also a great city-builder. He provided value and quality to his customers because he simply cared about people. You build a city by building for others beyond financial rewards. That's what Eph did, and, as a result, his business flourished and his contributions truly helped to build the city of Toronto."

"What a testament it was to Eph that well over one thousand people attended his funeral," said Temple Sinai's Rabbi Michael Dolgin. "It was a testament to this wonderful man, a man of great substance who treated everyone around him with dignity, respect and honesty. Eph was the kind of man who, no matter how successful he became, never let it go to his head. Family was his number one priority and after all these years, he and his beloved wife Shirley still held hands. "

"Eph was a giant in his time, and he would have been a giant in any time, I suspect," said Gerry Sheff, a former UJA Federation Campaign Chair and a man who was hired by Diamond at Cadillac in 1971. "He was a remarkable businessman, a remarkable family man who produced a remarkable family. I feel extremely privileged to have known him for 37 years. He touched so many lives in such a positive way. There are many significant people in our community and I would put Eph Diamond at the top of that illustrious list."

"Eph was a wonderful friend and business colleague for close to fifty years," said Lionel Schipper, also a former UJA Campaign Chair. "Like many people, I mourn the passing of a wonderful, bright, decent, witty and caring human being."

"Eph was always an advocate for social change and a defender of fundamental social justice," said UJA Federation CEO and President Ted Sokolsky. "He was a voice for reason, respect and religious pluralism at times when intolerance and parochialism threatened to undermine the fabric of our community. He was a man of honour and compassion and commitment in a world that often seemed bereft of those very qualities."

The vanity of denial, the guile of deceit

These words were written before the voting by the Kadima party membership for a new leader to replace Ehud Olmert. Olmert, as the whole world knows, finally surrendered the prime ministership of Israel because of the complete and abject collapse of the public's trust in him as a holder of the office due to the myriad allegations and investigations of corruption.

It is a foolish enterprise to try to predict the future. But it is not very likely that history will view favourably his tenure as prime minister. The Winograd Committee condemnation of his government's handling of the Second Lebanon War will be the chief entry next to his name in the logbook of memory.

The quality of persistence, however, will be a bold-font asterisk beside the entry. For even on the eve of the Kadima party elections, he was negotiating the contours of a peace agreement with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

But whereas vanity may have led Olmert to deny the moral irregularity of continuing to make decisions on behalf of a people who refused any longer to follow him, it is the abiding guile of Abbas' wilful deceit that propels him to make outrageous statements such as the one he made to Ha'aretz last week on the 15th anniversary of the signing of the Oslo Accords.

"The gap between the sides is very large," Abbas told Ha'aretz. "We presented our ideas and demands regarding the six issues [Jerusalem, borders, refugees, security, settlements and water] and have yet to receive any answer from the Israeli side."

"Did you think that 15 years after Oslo we would still be sitting here and talking about the chances for a peace agreement?" Ha'aretz asked Abbas.

"It's unbelievable," Abbas answered. "It's beyond any imagination that we haven't succeeded in reaching an agreement until now."

How is it possible to read those words without rolling one's eyes in utter disdain of the man who spoke them?

Are we all to forget that it was Abbas' boss and mentor, Yasser Arafat, who signed the accords without any intention of ever honouring them? Are we simply to shrug off as an unfortunate circumstance of the beginning of the decade, the intifadah of terror and suicide bombings let loose by Arafat against the people of Israel? And what of the weaponry on the Karine A that Arafat ordered, bought and signed for but was prevented from receiving? And so on and so on.

If this is beyond Abbas' imagination, then he must stretch it to include the realm of honesty and truth. He might then find the Israeli side – and especially the Israeli people – more willing to trust their fate once again to the promises of a Palestinian leader.

Kiddush HaShem on election day

The decision of Gov. Gen. Michaëlle Jean to dissolve Parliament and call a federal election for Oct. 14 presents a unique opportunity for Canadian Jewry to orchestrate a sparkling kiddush HaShem ("Federal election called for Oct. 14," CJN, Sept. 11). This is because Oct. 14 is the first day of the yom tov of Sukkot, a holy day when all servile labour is prohibited for Jews according to the divine law. Voting is impossible for a Jew, because writing is one of the 39 activities that are contraindicated on the Sabbath and festivals.

Accordingly, if every Canadian Jew can make the heroic effort to register for advance polling and hence avoid performing any labour on yom tov, this will serve as a message to humanity that Canadian Jewry is proud to keep the Torah, thereby sanctifying the Name of Heaven. At the same time, Canadian Jewry will diligently do its part to participate in the democratic process, thereby promoting the welfare of Canadian society.

It is certainly of interest to note in this regard that the Talmud derives from Scripture that in reward for Jews observing the first day of the yom tov of Sukkot, the Temple will be rebuilt, ushering in an era of universal peace and prosperity. Thus, all of humanity will benefit from the awesome kiddush HaShem that will be performed by Canadian Jewry.

An election on Christmas or Easter?

Setting an election for Oct. 14, one of the Jewish Holy Days of Sukkot, is simply outrageous ("Federal election called for Oct. 14," CJN, Sept. 11). While some argue that with advance polls, Jewish voters can vote on any one of several days before the actual election, what about Jewish candidates who wish to campaign on election day? What about Jewish volunteers who would normally assist candidates and campaigns on election day and assist with transportation to the polls for the elderly and the infirm?

Many are quick to point to the prime minister's support for Israel and the Jewish community and for his supposed support for minorities in general. But what kind of support does it show when he schedules an election, having been specifically reminded in advance by the Canadian Jewish Congress that it will conflict with a Jewish holiday?

Surely, no prime minister would schedule an election for Christmas Day or Easter, so why is it that this prime minister saw fit to set this unnecessary election to conflict with Sukkot?

Community handed Tories a victory

I was both dismayed and disappointed, though to be perfectly honest, not overly surprised to read that Rabbi Reuven Balka, co-president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, so easily and shamefully gave away our integrity as a religio-national community when he accepted Prime Minister Stephen Harper's explanation for the so-called necessity of scheduling the upcoming vanity election on Sukkot ("Federal election called for Oct. 14," CJN, Sept. 11).

The explanation the community has given – that there will be numerous advanced polls – is not at all the point. The point is that by scheduling the election for a major Jewish holiday, the Conservative leader has shown enormous disrespect for the Jewish community he so eagerly courts. The idea that the election could not be on any other day besides this Jewish holiday is insulting to all of us.

The timing of this election is exclusively designed to suit the partisan political needs of the Conservative party. When Harper scheduled the election for Sukkot, the Jewish community had a chance to reassert its leadership in Canadian politics. It had a chance to use its voice independently for the greater good. Instead, the community handed the Tories a senseless and undeserved victory on a silver platter. I can't help but wonder if the reaction would have been the same if it was "Prime Minister" Stéphane Dion making the call, instead of Harper.

Emil Fackenheim's fifth yahrzeit: A friend remembers

By ALLAN GOULD

On the fifth yahrzeit of one of the great Jewish minds of the past century, Emil Fackenheim, I am moved to reflect on his importance and on our friendship. Emil lived near Eglinton Avenue and Bathurst Street in Toronto for more than three decades, raising his children there before making aliyah in 1983.

It was in Toronto where he wrote many of the most compelling, challenging and profound works on the Shoah, Israel, and Jewish survival of our era, even though his first book was on Hegel.

This is a personal remembrance, because Emil was one of the closest friends that my wife and I, and our two children, Judah and Elisheva, had for a quarter century. Our friendship began when my bride, Merle Benjamin, took a course with Emil at Beth Tzedec Congregation. He and his wife, Rose, invited this newly married couple to Shabbat dinners, and we became like family. Our babies were left at "the Facky home" during our vacations. On one New Year's Eve, when we were away, Emil and Rose gave our son, Judah, a bubble bath. When he broke out in hives, they called our family doctor who, when he heard that it was "the famous philosopher" phoning, left his party to be able to meet the Fackenheims.

The two then-pre-teen children of Emil and Rose, Suzy and David, (their first-born, Michael, was born severely autistic and was reluctantly institutionalized by the time we met) often moved into our nearby home, sleeping on mattresses on our dining room floor when Emil was invited, with Rose, to give lectures across North America and around the world, his fame growing with each new book. A personal irony: nearly two decades ago, I received a call from the editor of The CJN: "We're dropping your weekly Jewish humour column to replace it with one by Emil Fackenheim about his life in Jerusalem, on Israeli politics, and…" I laughed out loud. "To have my space replaced by the greatest living Jewish philosopher and my dear friend is the ultimate compliment!" Emil and I would chuckle about this as we swam together in my backyard pool during his frequent visits after his aliyah.

Our friendship with the Fackenheims was both personal – his children still call Merle and me "Eema and Abba Sheynee" – as well as intellectual. Erev Shabbat dinners at the Fackenheims turned into sharing all the chagim together. Pesach seders were especially memorable, lasting long into the night, as illustrious guests debated the issues of our time. Through Emil, we met Yehuda Bauer, Raul Hilberg, David Demson, Basya Hunter, Genya Intrator, and the Doidge brothers. Over it all, presided Delilah, the Fackenheim cat, who sat on her special chair at the table, receiving blessings along with all the children.

Astonishingly brilliant and accomplished guests were always at the Fackenheim home, along with, at first, just the two of us, and later with our children, as well. They called them "Uncle Emil" and "Auntie Rose," and remain close friends with high-powered MBA Suzy, who lives with her husband, Mark, and children in London, England; David, the married father of three sons who works as a computer expert in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, and Emil and Rose's very late addition, Yossi, who is married to a naturopath, Iris.

Yossi is a stage actor and the translator of English plays into Hebrew. Merle and I will never forget the Shabbat afternoon when Emil and David walked to our house with the amazing announcement, "We're pregnant!" Emil, with his white, long beard, was already 63. With tears in his eyes, he said that he and his wife had to complete this unexpected pregnancy, even though Rose was nearly 50. "After the Holocaust, there is no other choice," he declared. Emil and Rose chose Yosef as their youngest's name because God "added" to his joy in his golden years.

Emil Ludwig Fackenheim was born on June 22, 1916, in Halle, Germany ("also the birthplace of the Baroque composer, Georg Friedrich Handel, the only one among the world's great composers who loved post-biblical Judaism – and Reinhard Heydrich, one of the most sadistic of all the Nazis, and seen as Hitler's successor," Emil noted with a chuckle). He died in Jerusalem on Sept. 19, 2003. Fittingly, his posthumous memoir, An Epitaph for German Judaism, is subtitled "From Halle to Jerusalem." Emil knew in his soul that those two cities were worlds apart morally, ethically and spiritually – yet he still chose to return to Germany to lecture frequently, and receive great honours in his later years.

The arc of Emil Fackenheim's life was extraordinary: from an educated, loving, well-to-do German family between the wars, to studies in rabbinics in Berlin ("The teacher I met first filled me with awe. Leo Baeck was national president of the B'nai B'rith Lodge, and my father was president of the local chapter in Halle, so he took me to meet him before classes"), to his arrest on the very evening of Kristallnacht (the Night of Broken Glass) on Nov. 9, 1938. Would he ever have escaped Germany, had he not that same day posted several letters that eventually brought him to the University of Toronto, and future fame as a professor and author? Then came his brief imprisonment in Sachsenhausen, a possible ticket to Shanghai and potential visa for a South American country, and finally, a real visa to Aberdeen, Scotland.

Soon after, Emil managed to get on a ship bound for Canada – the neighbouring one was torpedoed and sunk with great loss of life – before being locked behind barbed wire in a detention camp in Sherbrooke, Que., as a "deemed suspect" enemy alien. Emil loved to regale guests with the "welcoming speech" he heard upon his arrival in Canada, and which he repeated in his memoirs: "'Most of you are Jews, aren't you?' the fat major from Ottawa asked. We murmured assent. "Nevertheless, you have to keep clean.'"

My richest memories are of Emil holding his guests spellbound, chomping on an unlit cigar while balancing a chunk of salami and a shot of whiskey, with his stories of life under the Nazis and his journey here via Scotland. Later, his son, David, would be the first in the family to make aliyah and join the Israeli army, filling his parents with great pride. We all marvelled that David eventually married a Jewish woman from Glasgow, Wendy, whose family was close with the Scots who had ransomed Emil out of Sachsenhausen.

Emil had a keen wit, and we laughed along with him as he would recount in vivid details his struggles with balabatim as a pulpit rabbi in Hamilton and his endless journalistic battles with "A.C. Bastard Forrest," as he called the long-time, Israel-hating head of the United Church. His sense of justice matched his wit, as shown in his visits to refuseniks in Russia and his eventual aliyah. We watched in awe as Emil raged like a biblical prophet at anyone who threatened the Jews, especially the Jewish State.

Another great arc in Emil's life was not only geographical, but also intellectual and philosophical. The Hegelian expert moved spiritually closer to the Shoah and an obsession with Jewish survival, sparked by the Six Day War. One can sense why he was so admired by his fellow Jews and by the many Christians whom he inspired when we read the dedications of some of his major books. Encounters Between Judaism and Modern Philosophy is dedicated, "To the Israelis. After darkness, light." The Jewish Return into History: "To the memory of Lieut.-Col. Yonatan Netanyahu, deliverer of the Entebbe captives and student of philosophy." And his final book, which he was still editing at the time of his death: "To the memory of my wife, Rose, and the future of my grandchildren, Daniella, Benji, Dan, Adam, Gideon." The future of the Jews and Judaism was everything to him.

Emil Fackenheim knew that he had chosen a holy subject for much of his life's work. Emil insisted, with great passion and focus, on wrestling with the Devil, and it was never easy. He never let anyone off the hook, neither the Christians – "Nazi anti-Semitism, while anti-Christian, would have been impossible without centuries of Christian anti-Semitism" – nor the Jews: he insisted that Jews could never be free after the Holocaust "to give Hitler a posthumous victory" (his famous "614th Commandment") by choosing to turn their backs on their people, their faith or the State of Israel.

Emil cared for humanity, for my family, and for so many of his students over his decades of teaching at U of T, and later at Hebrew University. When I put together an anthology, titled What Did They Think of the Jews, of gentiles through history who wrote about Jews and Judaism, Emil was most supportive, offering to write a cover blurb that was generous and challenging: "Why have so many gentiles found it necessary to either hate or love Jews, and find it impossible to view them as ordinary folk? I suspect the ultimate reason is the book on account of which the Jews still exist – the Hebrew Bible."

One of Fackenheim's last books, The Jewish Bible After the Holocaust: A Re-reading, serves as a fitting epitaph for his attitude toward Jews, Judaism, the Shoah and the State of Israel. In it he wrote that "if, after what has occurred, there is still Jewish faith at all, it is, I am convinced, exclusively because of the fact that after the great catastrophe there arose a Jewish state. Through the centuries, the Jewish people never forgot Jerusalem. After the Holocaust, this people would have fallen prey to despair, had they not turned to Jerusalem. Never was Jewish statelessness so great a catastrophe as during the rule of the Third Reich. And in no time could the rebirth of a Jewish state be a blessing as great as today."

How lucky I was to have this delightful man as a close friend for nearly four decades. May his many books – I recommend beginning with What is Judaism? and To Mend the World, the most accessible – preserve his blessed memory.

Allan Gould is an author who lives in Toronto.

Opinions

History as heritage

In emphasizing history's importance to civilization, many people quote George Santayana's famous words, "Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it."

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

For some, that might be a compelling or sufficient reason to study the past. I for one am not so moved by it. I am, however, driven to examine the past for its lessons and hidden secrets, its perspectives and insights on life. By looking into the world as it once was, we learn much about our own ancestry, about our own roots and backgrounds.

Rather than out of a fear or a need to avoid errors, the glance back supplies us with priceless information about where we come from that helps us understand where we are going. The narratives of the past are replete with the wisdom of the ages. The stories are full of our traditions and culture.

It's in this sense that history is our guide to our heritage. It's the witness to our existence, and in studying it, we reveal our own human quintessence. Without it, we are naught.

I had always been impressed by how much Israelis know about their history and the stories that are truly embedded in their land. So I was quite surprised this summer when a number of Israeli educators bemoaned the current ignorance of the younger generation. (I almost felt as if I was at an education meeting in Montreal.) It seems as though the excellent education system that had for so long emphasized biblical stories and their connection to the land was no longer popular.

This new generation still went on tiyulim (hikes) of all sorts, but historical knowledge connected to the land was on the wane. And with it, love of the land also seemed to be ebbing. How could this be?

Here in Canada, we also suffer from the same "disease." We are not knowledgeable about our own heritage as Canadian Jews. (Do tourists at Canada's oldest synagogue know more than the average Canadian Jew?) We don't see it as our heritage, the inheritance we must guard and protect so that we can leave it to our children.

For too many, it's just the past, just a group of people who came here and settled. Big deal. Well, it was a big deal. The creation of a multicultural society, with a vibrant poly-lingual social and cultural milieu, is a great story, and it's our story, too. Our ancestors fought for a place where Jews could pray and educate their own children and still fit in.

The story of that struggle, of the Jewish experience in Canada, is not nothing.

It's our heritage, and we owe it to ourselves and to future generations to know it, revel in it and preserve it.

Just who are we?

Multicultural? Melting Pot? Multi-ethnic? Mosaic? Mash up? Just what is the approach to living in this material world that we Jews have adopted in 21st-century in Canada?

Recently, I caught the last broadcast on CBC Radio of a program called MashUP. It was, I gather, a series about Canadian identities and the increasingly poly-ethnic makeup of our world, with people on the show discussing their variegated backgrounds.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

For example, one person was Scottish-Irish, German and one-eighth Jewish. Another was Hindu-Sikh, Austrian and Italian, while another was Chinese-Korean, Spanish and Polish. Still another African-Canadian with some Jewish and Croatian.

I'm not making this up. The program ended with various voices reciting their heritages until they all blended into one mélange of sound.

Recently, we have also read in the pages of this newspaper about the 2006 Canadian census, which showed that fewer Jews are choosing "Jewish" as an ethnicity, whether alone or in concert with other choices. Concern was expressed that Jews are disappearing into that mélange of voices, losing in the process what sets Jews apart as a distinct religion and culture within Canadian society.

Having studied several census reports over the past 20 years, I'm not surprised about this, at least not in the way some people are. That's because in order to arrive at Jewish population figures, it was decided to cross-tabulate the answer to the question about religion with responses to the Jewish ethnicity question – called the "Jewish standard definition" – to arrive at the figures we work with.

Briefly: a respondent who says he or she is Jewish by both religion and ethnicity (whether alone or with other ethnic identities) is considered Jewish. A person who answers that he or she is Jewish by ethnicity but indicates no religion is included as Jewish. A person who answers Jewish by religion but lists a non-Jewish ethnicity is also considered Jewish.

Only if someone answers that he or she has another religion – even though they responded "Jewish" to the ethnicity question – are they not counted in the totals of Jews in Canada.

Furthermore, ethnicity – whatever that means – has never been a reliable guide to Jewish identity. A convert such as myself could never answer the ethnicity question as "ethnically Jewish" because my background culture, family ancestors and upbringing were all decidedly non-Jewish, and I include those factors in my definition of ethnicity (as do many sociologists).

The rabbis realized that ethnicity – which in past times was equated with culture, and even race – was a poor guide to determining Jewishness. Thus Judaism welcomes converts and considers them Jewish, whatever their genetic background.

I also don't agree, as some have said, that the decline in people's "ethnic" consciousness indicates that they've forgotten their origins, culture and religion.

In fact, to me, the question of ethnicity, as far as Jewish identity is concerned, is practically meaningless unless it's combined with the other factors I've mentioned.

In another study just completed in Vancouver – a survey of what we called Jewish diversity – we discovered that very few respondents were choosing "ethnically Jewish" as an identity. In fact, out of nearly 200 respondents, only eight chose the "ethnically Jewish" category.

So when it comes to Jews in Canada today, are we a mash-up or a distinctive part of the Canadian mosaic? By the "standard Jewish definition," we're still a growing, if diverse, community.

I'm not worried about the decline in "ethnicity." I am worried about other declines, but that's not one of them.

Of course there are some young people who no longer relate to shtetls. Why should they? Some come from Sephardi backgrounds, so a shtetl is the last thing they will relate to. Many know their past, but are living Jewishly in this brave new world of many faiths and cultures.

Life is always a challenge. To define who we are is not to say, "I can't be Canadian," but to say, "How can I as a Jewish Canadian enjoy the open society in which I live, yet stay committed to Jewish living in all its glorious diversity?"

Now that's a challenge.

Hate crimes

Sgt. Stephen Camp, an officer of the Edmonton Police Service and the Northern Chair of the Alberta Hate and Bias Crime Committee, is currently spearheading a drive to amend Canada's Criminal Code in order to create a new designation, the so-called "hate crime."

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

The hate crime would be an offence motivated by the accused's hate, bias or prejudice on the basis of race, national or ethnic origin, language, colour, religion, sex, age, mental or physical disability, sexual orientation or other similar factors.

The new proposals would attach a new subsection to each of 11 specific existing offences, such as assault, murder, manslaughter, mischief, arson, uttering threats, sexual assault and others. For example, in addition to the existing law related to assault, a new provision would increase the maximum penalty for an assault that is motivated by hate to a higher term of imprisonment than the normal assault conviction.

To be sure, there already exists provisions dealing with hate in the Criminal Code. These include the long-standing offences related to the propagation of hate against identifiable groups, a provision supported for decades by the organized Jewish community.

However, it has proven to be difficult to secure a conviction under these laws. There is also a relatively new provision in relation to the commission of mischief against property used for religious worship, such as a synagogue or cemetery, if that mischief is motivated by bias, prejudice or hate.

Another important section of the Criminal Code states that in imposing a sentence, a judge shall take into consideration whether an offence "was motivated by bias, prejudice or hate based on race, national or ethnic origin, language, colour, religion, sex, age, mental or physical disabilities or sexual orientation or any other similar factor."

Presumably, this would lead to the enhancement of the sentence imposed in such cases.

Notwithstanding the existing provisions in the Criminal Code, what is the rationale for adding higher maximum sentences for 11 specific offences and are these changes advisable?

The proponents of these additional sentence enhancement sections argue that hate crimes create terror in the community and that they strike at the core values of Canadians, including those values constitutionally enshrined in our Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In addition, they suggest that since hate crimes per se are not specifically addressed in the Criminal Code, this can arguably lead to a loss of public trust and confidence in our social institutions, including government and law enforcement. They also assert that the prosecution of hate crimes would provide a deterrence to those who might contemplate criminal acts motivated by hate.

While these are all important and appropriate objectives, there are some concerns about these proposed amendments. First, one could argue that hate-motivated crimes are already sufficiently dealt with in the Criminal Code, as judges are mandated to take into account hate when imposing sentences for existing crimes. This provision could be used to great advantage without any additional amendments to the Code.

Secondly, the proposed changes create evidentiary problems. To be sure, short of an admission by an accused individual, it will be difficult to prove that the underlying motivation for a given crime was hate. It would depend on an accused's past conduct and the particular circumstances of a given case.

Finally, one might ask whether these proposals are necessary since the Criminal Code already contains several sections dealing with hate. These sections, however, are substantively different from those 11 crimes covered by the new hate crimes proposal. As previously mentioned, the existing hate-related sections cover the propagation of hate, including the advocacy of genocide, the public incitement of hatred and the wilful promotion of hatred. They do not, however, cover other criminal behaviour (such as assault, murder, manslaughter, etc.) that is motivated by hate.

Ultimately, the proposals should be carefully studied so that we can make a proper determination as to their advisability. We should acknowledge that enlightened police authorities are taking a lead role in the fight to suppress hate, bias and prejudice. Our society should be as free as possible from the abhorrent conduct of those who commit crimes motivated by their hateful attitudes. Accordingly, the proposal to create hate crimes provisions in the Criminal Code is worthy of serious consideration.

Jews and blacks in the United States

In one of the defining moments of the civil rights movement in the United States, the Rev. Martin Luther King and his followers marched from Selma to Birmingham, Ala., in the mid-1960s to demand full racial equality. Marching side by side with King was a Conservative rabbi, Abraham Joshua Heschel, one of the foremost theologians of the day. Heschel's presence at the historic demonstration was one of the high-water points of an era when Jews and African-Americans shared a vision of a just society and worked together to try to achieve it. Recently, in a nod to this period, Barack Obama, the African-American Democratic politician who would be president, made a reference to "the many Jews who joined the civil rights struggle in this nation."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The golden age of Jewish engagement with blacks was short-lived. It lasted approximately from 1945 until the late 1960s and broke apart under the impact of black anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism, affirmative action programs and growing acceptance of Jews by mainstream America.

Yet even during its heyday, the alliance between Jews and blacks was not untroubled, with co-operation coexisting with tension.

This is Cheryl Lynn Greenberg's thesis in Troubling the Waters: Black-Jewish Relations in the American Century (Princeton University Press), an admirably balanced, fairly unsentimental account of a former entente.

Greenberg, a professor of history at Trinity College, approaches the topic with eyes wide open in an attempt to plumb its complexities.

Setting her tone early on, she says that the two communities had little contact and that Jews played virtually no role in the public debates over slavery prior to the Civil War.

Southern Jews did not challenge the status quo, fearing an anti-Semitic backlash, while northern Jews showed the same kind of opposition or ambivalence toward the abolition of slavery as their white Christian counterparts.

Blacks, meanwhile, were infected by the anti-Jewish stereotypes and animus of the day.

And yet, as Greenberg observes, a disproportionate number of compassionate Jews were prominently involved in black self-help or civil rights organizations long before desegregation.

The president of the Sears, Roebuck department store chain, Julius Rosenwald, was the single largest contributor to the National Urban League, which was founded in 1911 to assist blacks migrating from the south to the north.

Joel Spingarn, a lawyer, was the chair of the board of what was probably the most important black organization, the NAACP, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Being the victims of persecution and discrimination themselves, Jews were therefore sensitive to the spate of lynchings, race riots and atrocities that accompanied the first decades of the 20th century.

This prompted the black leader, A. Philip Randolph, to comment, "The Jewish people have been fairer and squarer of their treatment of Negroes than any other people in the world."

Booker T. Washington, the black scientist and community activist, went one step further, saying that "the Negro has much to learn from the Jew" in terms of survival and preservation of culture.

Nonetheless, the majority of Jews and blacks did not make common cause, being too preoccupied with themselves to pay much attention to each other, Greenberg writes.

On purely subjective grounds, Jewish and black interests collided.

In northern black neighbourhoods, blacks complained of exploitation by Jewish shop owners, the American Jewish Committee reported.

And in the south, particularly after the 1915 lynching of Atlanta businessman Leo Frank – a transplanted northerner who was accused of murdering a white girl – Jews were careful not to rock the boat, reflecting "the mores, the hopes, the politics and even the prejudices of the society around them," the southern Jewish writer Harry Golden commented.

Black-Jewish relations, therefore, were riven by contradictions.

Being both victimized by bigotry, Jews and blacks had an objective interest in challenging the status quo on a joint basis. But racial, religious and class differences prevented them from using shared grievances as a basis for consistent collaboration.

Despite this chasm, some blacks had unrealistically high expectations of Jews, says Greenberg, citing a Detroit study.

By and large, however, neither black nor Jewish leaders moved to establish a broad, unified front against prejudice until the 1940s. As she puts it, "Jews concerned themselves almost exclusively with problems as they affected Jews."

True, Jewish civil rights organizations in the 1930s formally asked black groups for assistance in boycotting German goods and fighting fascism. Black organizations embraced these objectives, but as Greenberg notes, most Jewish organizations "tempered pro-civil rights pronouncements with warnings against linking their concerns too closely with those of African-Americans."

For example, Jews declined to participate in a 1941 mass march on Washington, D.C., planned by blacks, regarding it as a sign of potential subversion.

According to Greenberg, black-Jewish cooperation first emerged in the attempts to improve local race relations and pass civil rights laws. By 1943, the Anti-Defamation League had joined efforts to integrate the armed forces, at least on a voluntary basis.

The black-Jewish relationship blossomed in the postwar period as organizations from both communities co-operated actively to integrate schools, win fair employment practices and force chain restaurants to serve black customers.

But in southern states, Jews tended to be silent or supportive of Jim Crow laws. When Jews spoke up in defence of blacks, the consequences could be terrible.

In 1958, white supremacists dynamited a synagogue in Atlanta because its rabbi advocated desegregation. Several years later, in Mississippi, two young Jewish voter registration workers, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner, were murdered by the Ku Klux Klan.

Yet even as Jews and blacks laboured in unison, African-American anti-Semitism reared its ugly head. "Jabs at the ostensible wealth and control of the Jewish community came from even prominent black newspapers and leaders," she writes, citing the case of the Chicago Defender, which printed, without comment, an anti-Semitic slur made by the wife of Joe Lewis, the legendary boxer.

By the 1960s, the alliance buckled under the weight of changing times. Support for anti-colonial struggles persuaded many blacks to side with Israel, but in the wake of the Six Day War, they shifted their sympathy to the Palestinians.

Radical black groups, such as the Black Panthers, took to describing Israel as an imperialist oppressor state. As the Jewish community grew still more affluent, Jews gradually shucked off their outsider status and became less attentive to the needs of blacks.

"Each group felt betrayed by the other," Greenberg says.

The rise of "identity politics," with its emphasis on group membership and its rejection of pluralism, had an effect as well, as did expressions of black militancy and affirmative action programs.

Further tension occurred when civil rights activist Jesse Jackson referred to Jews as "Hymies" and Andrew Young, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, resigned under duress after meeting a leader of the PLO.

Today, Jews and blacks often have different agendas, but organizationally, they continue to work together on issues ranging from anti-poverty programs to hate crimes legislation.

Greenberg, in Troubling the Waters, skilfully documents these changes and continuities.

Congress' new exec. director helps develop policy

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Benjamin Shinewald didn't come to his new job at Canadian Jewish Congress with a crystal ball, but that's one piece of equipment that could stand him in good stead as he gets acclimatized to the advocacy organization.

As Congress' new national executive director and general counsel, predicting future issues and preparing for them is a handy skill to have. "We should scan the horizon and lay the groundwork for emerging concerns," he said.

'We should scan the horizon and lay the groundwork for emerging issues'

The upcoming United Nations anti-racism conference – known as "Durban II," it's the follow-up to the notorious anti-Semitic UN gathering in 2000 in Durban, South Africa – is coming in April 2009, and Congress is concerned about the fallout.

Even before he got there, Congress had identified the Durban II conference as posing potential problems for the Canadian Jewish community, and it has been working with contacts in other communities to minimize the fallout domestically, Shinewald said.

As one of Congress' "back office guys," he prepares the materials and talking points for the organization's officers and directors who present Congress' case to others.

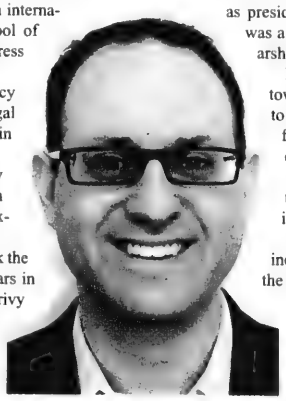
Shinewald, a graduate of the University of Toronto law school who also holds a master's in international relations from the London School of Economics, believes his role with Congress "is a perfect fit."

It allows him to get involved in policy questions, leadership development, legal questions and even to use his facility in Hebrew and French.

"It's the first time I'm able to bring my skill set and personal interests together in one spot. That's a very gratifying and exciting opportunity," he said.

A native of Winnipeg, Shinewald took the job in mid-July after spending three years in the economic policy secretariat of the Privy Council Office. He'll remain in Ottawa for the next year or so before moving to Toronto, his wife's hometown.

So far, he's been spending his time getting up to speed on many files, particularly Durban II, advocacy on Darfur, relations with aboriginal communities, tackling anti-Semitism and other policy areas. Congress' job, he said, is to be "the official voice of the Jewish community" and express its views "in as respectful a way as possible."



Benjamin Shinewald

Shinewald, 36, attended Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate in Winnipeg, a Jewish high school, and later graduated from U of T's law school. He served as class president and as president of the Student Law Society. He was a two-time finalist for a Rhodes scholarship.

He articled at the prestigious downtown law firm Torys and then travelled to Israel, where he was one of four clerks for the Supreme Court of Israel's then-chief justice, Aharon Barak.

The Israeli high court, he said, often cites Canadian constitutional law in its judgements.

Clerking for the chief justice "was incredible. I was working for arguably the single greatest legal mind in the world at the time."

Back in Canada at the PCO, Shinewald was involved in the policy aspects related to trade issues, such as international trade and the softwood lumber controversy.

He also married Marise Hart, and together they have a one-year-old daughter, Orly.

Two years ago, he was named an Action Canada fellow, one of 20 young people named as emerging leaders in Canada. He will work under the supervision of Congress CEO Bernie Farber.

Strong Toronto participation urged at upcoming New York rally

By Sally Szuster

On Monday, September 22 at 11:45 am, thousands of people will gather at Dag Hammarskjold Plaza (across from the United Nations) in New York to protest the genocidal statements of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and his visit to the United Nations. UJA Federation is encouraging the community's participation at this urgent gathering, sponsored by a coalition of organizations, including the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, United Jewish Communities and the Jewish Council for Public Affairs.

Senator Hillary Clinton, along with other high profile politicians and leaders will address the rally.

"The idea is to send a message to Ahmadinejad and world leaders," said Malcolm Hoenlein, the executive vice chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. "We're not going to be silent when someone threatens to destroy Israel".

"Teheran's continued and accelerated efforts to produce nuclear weapons represent an urgent threat to regional stability and to world peace. Despite political measures to seek a solution, Iran has vowed to attain nuclear status and now claims to be close to its goal," said Steve Gutow, executive director, Jewish Council for Public Affairs and Howard Rieger, president and CEO, United Jewish Communities, in a joint statement.

Senator Hillary Clinton

Iran has issued repeated threats to wipe Israel off the map.

Hillel of Greater Toronto and National Jewish Campus Life are organizing a contingent of university and college students to fill a bus to New York.

"It is critical that Hillel of Greater Toronto's student voice is heard as we stand up together as a community to Ahmadinejad's message of hatred, his nuclear threats and his human rights abuses," said Zac Kaye, Hillel executive director.

Students interested in attending the rally should contact Stephanie Krasman at Hillel at Stephanie.krasman@hilleltoronto.org or 416-913-2427.

Members of the community interested in attending the rally should contact Ilana Hirt at ihirt@ujafed.org or 416 840-2987.

Jewish organizations held a similar demonstration last year during Ahmadinejad's visit to New York for the opening of the General Assembly. Ahmadinejad also spoke then at a forum at Columbia University.

Toronto artist beautifies ancient Israeli gem

By Daniel Horowitz

The Israeli city of Acco gained a new attraction recently as Canadian artist-in-residence Ian Leventhal worked with three local art students on a unique design for the city's "Unistream Dome." In just five days, Leventhal and his team transformed the ancient dome into a unique and wondrous artistic landmark.

Leventhal's artistry was part of UJA Federation's strategic vision for Acco.

"This project had all the ingredients of what I love best about tikun olam (repairing the world)," said Leventhal, "a trip to Israel, a chance to transform a tired corner of Acco into a vibrant and joyous oasis through art, and an opportunity to work alongside the young people of Israel."

Acco is rich in culture and history that reaches as far back as ancient times and as recent as the founding of the State of Israel. A true historic gem, in recent years the socioeconomic situation of residents of the city has deteriorated. These conditions were further exacerbated by the Second Lebanon War, when the city was besieged by Katyusha attacks and 106 rockets landed in the city.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is committed to expanding existing employment and social initiatives through UIA Federations Canada in order to support Acco's residents and help restore the city to its former glory.

The newly decorated Unistream Dome in Acco

The brainchild of community leader and philanthropist Harold Wolfe, the idea to beautify Acco came to him during an earlier visit to Israel. "I visited a police shelter in Acco the last time I was there, and I started thinking about other shelters in the north that must be very dreary," said Wolfe. "I thought if those shelters were decorated, it would improve the lives of Israelis. So, I contacted Ian, who immediately agreed to participate in the project, which I hope will be the first of many similar initiatives throughout Israel."

The newly-renovated dome hosts the Unistream program, a unique three-year business entrepreneurship program for young leaders supported in Acco by UJA Federation and local business leaders. The program helps participants develop their potential, vision and skills through workshops, mentoring and competitions. Each center, open daily after school, is equipped with sophisticated technological equipment. Now, the center will attract additional visitors with its stunning exterior.

"When Harold approached me, I couldn't resist," said Leventhal. "Other than the tourist sites, Acco cried out to me for some attention. Harold was right; a little paint really was going to make a huge difference, esthetically, spiritually and even economically."

The ancient Hebrew scrolls were discovered by a Bedouin boy in 1947, buried in a cave in Qumran in the Judean Desert. Since then, scientists and historians have been eager to learn what the scrolls reveal about the history of the Second Temple period.

Vered, who was in Canada twice before as the emissary for the Jewish National Fund after ending his 24-year military career in the Israeli army in 1981, has a master's degree in history and is excited at the idea of educating the public about IAA findings that he said are very important to understanding our ancestry.

"The scrolls are written evidence that shows that the Bible had the same writing [text] about 2,100 to 2,200 years ago. There are some deviations, but mainly, it is the same thing," Vered said.

"In most of the scrolls, the writing is in Hebrew letters, in square Hebrew letters that we use today," he said, adding there is evidence that the Jews of that time had a system similar to the one used by modern Jews to write HaShem Hameforash, or God's name.

He said the letters yud [k]ey vav [k]ey were written in ancient letters rather than Hebrew ones, in much the same way as Jews in eastern Europe used Yiddish.

"One of our scholars who works for the authority found, I would say, a direct link between the way our ancestors referred to the messiah and the way the Christians refer to the messiah... It turns out that the resurrection was not something that was invented by the Christians, but it is another link that put together the old religion with the new religion," Vered said.

But, he added, there are many exciting findings that the IAA is working on beyond the scrolls.

"In Jerusalem, on Har Zion, we found the southern wall of the old City of David."

Earlier this month, remains of the wall of the city from the time of the Second Temple that was destroyed during the Great Revolt of 66 CE, as well as remains of a city wall that was built on top of it in the Byzantine period, were uncovered in an excavation in Har Zion.

Pottery from the Qumran period 1st century C.E.

He said these findings are consistent with recorded history from that time.

Vered realizes that he has a lot of work to do to make the IAA relevant to Canadians, but he is ready for the task.

"I am going to be available for every meeting in the city that people can think of. I'm going to speak at synagogues, at associations, I'm going to speak at schools. I want to create programs for schools and associations before they visit the scrolls exhibit. We would like to prepare the schools for the exhibition by letting the children know and understand what the scrolls are, and let them come in on a school visit at a reduced price supported by us."

He added that he also hopes to organize a fundraiser next spring and is considering a novel way to generate substantial funds.

"I'm looking for somebody that will donate a big sum, and then we'll let them have an exhibition of the scrolls in their home for a meeting with people. That is something that has never been done in the world. That is something that is mind-boggling," he said, adding, "I'm not sure it will happen, because we need special people to look into it."

Vered is also looking into creating a twinning project between Canadian Jewish communities and antique sites in Israel.

"We'd like to twin a synagogue here in Toronto with an ancient synagogue in Israel."

He said in the same way that Jewish communities travel to shtetls in Poland to explore their heritage, he hopes the twinning concept will encourage Canadians to visit Israel's ancient sites and even raise funds in an effort to maintain them.

"That is the way we are keeping our own identity. Without any question, Christians are looking at the sites in the same way. They look at how their ancestors lived."

Although Vered has been in Toronto for only a short time, Canadians are already showing their support and becoming actively involved.

"We have now a board in Toronto, and we have supporters in Calgary, supporters in Vancouver, Montreal. We are looking to enlarge the base of support. We are looking to reach more and more people," he said.

"The most important thing we can do is reach the young people and to let them have the feeling, the wish to see, the wish to know."

More Canadians than ever make aliyah this year

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Lian Sela, director of the Israel Aliyah Centre Toronto and Western Canada, has some good news.

By the end of September, more olim will have left Canada for Israel than in all of 2007.

She said that while 215 people made aliyah through her office last year, she forecasts that by the end of the year at least 230 people will have made the move.

She does not have a clear reason for the jump in numbers, she said during a recent interview that included five people who are planning aliyah in the next couple of months, but cites Israel's 60th anniversary as a possible reason.

"All the events may have subconsciously tweaked people's desire to live in Israel."

Zionism has many different colours, she said. "We see people from all walks of life – young people who have taken part in programs in Israel, those who were born in Israel and want to make aliyah, young families and retired couples."

Sela said that making aliyah is easier now because technology has made the world smaller. "Its easy to keep in touch with family and friends.

"It can also be done in stages. People can spend time volunteering in the summer, or they can make a 'mini-aliyah,' in which they have a second home in Israel. There are many different ways to do it."

Josh Zweig, 24, who has been on a number of TaglitBirthright Israel trips as a participant and as a leader, is moving to Israel in October. Aliyah was not always on his mind, said Zweig, a business graduate from the University of Western Ontario, "but I met a lot of Israelis when I was travelling through [such places] as Hawaii, Fiji, South America and India. Not only did my Hebrew improve, I realized I could really identify with these people. We saw eye to eye."

He's moving "a little bit ahead of schedule," but he has been working at an accounting firm, he said, "and I need a change. I have a job interview set up in Israel, but for the first time in my life I have no direct plan. I'm looking forward to a new chapter in my life."

Correcting himself, he said that he does have one plan. "I'm going to get some proper hummus – the best I've ever tasted."

Kelly Levy, 25, returned from Israel at the end of July after spending six months as a photography intern and is now making aliyah. "I had considered aliyah for a long time, but living there, I really got a feel for what it is like. I plan to do an ulpan, and then as a new immigrant I can attend university for free."

She has friends and family in Israel, she said, and she is looking forward to "living in Tel Aviv, going to the beach, and having an adventure. People feel safer in Israel now – tourists are everywhere."

Sara Greenwood, 24, spent the past year in Israel studying for a master's degree in neurobiology at Hebrew University, and is returning to Israel as an olah. "I plan to finish my master's degree, and then I'll decide if I'll pursue a PhD," she said. "I feel like I'm returning home. When my parents visited me, they said they could see that I belonged there."

Daniel Bernstein, a software developer, is making aliyah in December with his wife and two young daughters. "My parents are from Israel, and they've instilled in me a love for the country. They are living there now, and my two siblings are there as well."

He and is wife have talked about moving for three years, he said, and "we knew we had to set a date. Finally, we just decided to do it.

"I look forward to seeing my family, and I look forward to raising my children in an environment where they can feel completely at home. Even though the language is new, there is a complete comfort level in Israel."

Visiting Israel previously, he said, he had always felt like a visitor. "One event changed my perspective. When I visited my sister's office – she does the same thing I do – I saw people doing what I do for a living. I saw myself in that office. It changed my whole way of thinking."

Nicki Weinberg, a library technician, has four daughters aged 19 to 25 who have all made aliyah, and she is moving there in December.

"I'm excited to be with my family, but I'm not only going for them. It is important for me to be there, and for them to be there," she said. "I'm also looking forward to contributing to Israel. Right now, I feel like my foot is in both countries. I can't wait to make the leap."

Polish Jews are 'de-assimilating', scholar says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In a historic reversal, a "de-assimilation" process has taken place among Jews in Poland since the end of the Communist era, says Stanislaw Krajewski, a leader of the Polish Jewish community.

Jews who stayed in Poland after the Holocaust were usually highly assimilated Communists who regarded themselves as Poles of Jewish descent.

But with the dissolution of Communism in the late 1980s, a number of Poles of Jewish ancestry gradually returned to their roots and became formal and informal members of the Jewish community, noted Krajewski, a 58-year-old Warsaw University philosophy professor and board member of the Union of Jewish Religious Communities in Poland.

Stanislaw Krajewski

Using himself as an example of this phenomenon, Krajewski said he was raised in a secular household where Jewishness was considered alien and irrelevant, a relic of the past.

Charting his path back to the Jewish fold, he explained it was facilitated by a state-sponsored anti-Jewish campaign launched by the Polish government in the wake of the 1967 Six Day War.

This campaign, officially portrayed in anti-Zionist hues and culminating with the emigration of about 30,000 Jews from Poland from the late 1960s onward, drove him to the realization that his Jewishness mattered.

Speaking at Christ Church Deer Park in Toronto last week at a forum marking the 20th anniversary of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada, Krajewski said that formerly alienated Jews such as himself remain "Polonized" and feel quite at home in Poland.

By his estimation, 6,000 to 8,000 Jews live in Poland today, compared to more than three million in 1939. But there are probably 10 times as many Poles who claim Jewish ancestry.

The majority of such Poles will never identify with the Jewish community, but in the past 20 years, thousands have emerged from the woodwork and identified themselves as Jews in a remarkable de-assimilation process that continues to this day.

In a survey of Poland's history since World War II, Krajewski said that 90 per cent of Polish Jews were murdered in the Holocaust. In the postwar period, he added, 90 per cent of the Polish Jews who had gone back to Poland after 1945 eventually left in a series of waves.

"There is no perceptible emigration of Jews from Poland today," he said.

As a result of the late 1960s anti-Semitic campaign, Jewish life in Poland almost disappeared, Krajewski observed. But since then, there has been a religious and a cultural revival. "To me, the new Jewish life in Poland today is not a footnote, but a new chapter."

There are Jews in the Diaspora who regard Poland as a vast Jewish cemetery. "But to me, it's my place of everyday life," he said.

The Jewish community is growing, though slowly, yet there are no guarantees about its future. "I don't know if Jews will be living in Poland in 30 or 50 years."

He added: "It would be a great tragedy for Poland if Poland became Judenrein."

In a related comment, Krajewski said that Jewish culture without Jews exists in Poland, promoted by Catholic Poles who administer Jewish film festivals and cultural events, and who study and speak Yiddish.

Such philo-Semitic Poles regret that Poland's once sizable Jewish population has dwindled so drastically. But other Poles are pleased by the fact that Poland has morphed into an ethnically homogenized country and that its "Jewish problem" has been solved once and for all, Krajewski said.

He expressed satisfaction that no historical topics related to the Holocaust, including the 1941 massacre by Poles of 1,600 Jews in the town of Jedwabne, are deemed taboo in contemporary Poland.

"There is a debate on all the issues," he said, comparing Poland's openness to the virtual silence found in formerly Nazi-occupied countries such as Slovakia and Romania.

Krajewski, whose topic was Polish-Christian Relations Since 1945: Reflections of a Participant, said that Christian-Jewish dialogue in Poland today is still in its infancy.

But Jews and Christians can be great allies, he suggested. Respect for Judaism in Poland is widespread, but not deep, he said.

Citing two surveys conducted in 1992 and 2002, he pointed out that traditional anti-Semitism, and opposition to it, have both grown. "It means that Poles are more ready to express their opinions than in the past," he said, in an allusion to the Communist era.

Krajewski voiced doubt that Poland will pass legislation compensating Jews for lost personal property. "A solution is needed, but I don't see how it can be done."

By his count, there have been 10 attempts by Polish governments since the 1990s to return such property to their rightful Jewish and Christian owners. Poland, however, passed a law in 1997 providing for the restitution of Jewish communal property.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

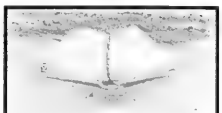
The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Let's leave the curses behind

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS



Rabbinic Reflections

This week's Torah portion must be read before Rosh Hashanah and not after.

The Talmud states that Ezra made a decree that the curses of Deuteronomy should be read before Rosh Hashanah and that the curses in Leviticus should be read before Shavuot.

I don't know about you, but I have wondered: why don't we link the cycle of Torah reading with Rosh Hashanah? Why not begin the Torah with the portion of Genesis, the Creation, on the Shabbat after Rosh Hashanah and end the entire Torah on the last Shabbat of the year? We don't do that. We finish and begin the Torah on Simchat Torah, three weeks after Rosh Hashanah.

Ezra was responsible for this. Ezra – the leader with Nechemiah of the return of the Jews to Jerusalem after the Babylonian exile – made a number of bold initiatives to strengthen the religious life of the new settlement in the land of Israel. The book of Ezra is fascinating historical reading, but that's a discussion for another time.

Ezra felt it was important to read the curses of our parshah, Ki Tavo, before Rosh Hashanah and hence finish the Torah in a couple of weeks. Why did Ezra feel compelled to want to read our parshah before Rosh Hashanah?

The curses of our parshah are chilling. Due to a weak commitment to Torah, the Jews will be scattered around the world, they will suffer economically and psychologically, they will be attracted to idol worship, and then things will get even worse.

The Talmud asks our question (or actually, we are asking the Talmud's question): why read this parshah before Rosh Hashanah? The answer is that so all those curses will stay with last year, and we can start the New Year with blessings. As we throw out the old calendar, we can close the book on those curses as well.

But hold on. Rosh Hashanah is not this week. It's next week. We actually don't read the curses on the last Shabbat of the year, but on the second-last Shabbat.

Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik pointed out that the approach to Rosh Hashanah cannot come from depression but from optimism. If we read curses right before Rosh Hashanah, we get depressed. So we read one more parshah right after the curses to cushion the blow. And, indeed, in Nitzavim, we read of the promise of the ultimate return of the Jewish people to God and His return to us. And that is joyful.

Rosh Hashanah is both serious and joyful. We want to finish off the curses, but we don't want to be depressed by them. We need to know the weightiness of life, but also its joy. We live with heavy responsibility and with deep elation.

We end the year with the curses – they should stay with last year. And we enter Rosh Hashanah with the optimism about the greatness of the Jewish people and the promise of the love of the Jews for God and His love for us.

A moving experience

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

Our bags were packed. We were ready to go. The car had all the plants and food. All that was left to do was turn off the lights.

Our family moved this summer to a new house. During the process, I was struck by the notion that moving is an apt image for the upcoming High Holidays.

When we see a play that changes our ideas, we say, "It moved me." A moving speech is one that makes you reconsider or re-evaluate your priorities. A moving experience is one that has deep and lasting consequences.

So consider the process of tshuvah through the metaphor of moving. Your old house is where you have been and who you once were. It's safe, familiar and in need of repair. Your new house is where – and who – you want to be. It's fabulous, new and a little bit scary.

The three steps of moving are like three steps of tshuvah.

First, you take stock of what you already have, what you need for the future, and what you can get rid of. You're not going to take all that stuff to the new house, are you? Purge! Don't look back, no matter how hard it is not to. You just have to get rid of it. You have to dig deep, determine what's worthy and walk away from the old stuff. It's a long, emotional process that requires both patience and insight. But when you're done, you have much less "baggage."

Second, you plan for the future. The shopping and choosing begins. You draw up blueprints and make lists. Like "New Year's resolutions," you think a lot about how to get to the new place, piling up good intentions about what you'll do and what you'll accomplish there. The new house – and the new you – includes some major dreaming. You relish the challenges ahead and prepare as best you can for the surprises in store – the roadblocks you didn't expect, the problems you'll encounter and the absolute insecurity of the "unfamiliar."

Then the third step can begin – the real work of moving. You thought you were done, but surprise: there are still renovations! You didn't realize how many and how long they would take, and how much they would cost. You thought you could just do a fast "fluff" job, covering over the cracks and stains, then sprucing it all up with pillows. But you quickly come to realize that it's really about structural work if you're going to do it right and improve the place from the inside out. No "quick and dirty" will work for you in the new house if you want it to be truly better in all aspects. It's a real upgrade. Why move if it's going to be the same old place? As Rebbe Nachman of Breslov said, if you won't be better tomorrow than you are today, what need do you have for tomorrow?

Moving wasn't easy, but we could see its spiritual side, too. We listened to our "rabbi" (read: real estate agent). We did a "havdalah" ritual at the old house to separate from it. We blessed our new house with bread and salt, and we shared with one another our dreams for the future there, room by room.

When it was over, we were different.

On the High Holidays, people go to services and want to be "moved." I suggest they start by purging, preparing and upgrading.

Jewish Life

Democracy is a Jewish thing

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

With election campaigns now going on in both Canada and the Unites States – and, quite possibly, soon in Israel – we have an opportunity to reflect on the wonderful freedoms that Jews enjoy throughout the world.

Many tend to think that Judaism is indifferent, or even hostile, to the concept of democracy, preferring monarchy instead. This is both a misunderstanding of democracy and of Judaism. It was the Jewish people who brought the concept of freedom, the central tenet of democracy, to the world.

Notions such as protecting minority rights, a transparent justice system, social safety nets, privacy rights, and freedom of speech and thought have their antecedents, and are rooted, in Jewish tradition.

Democracy derives its authority from the people themselves. A similar concept exists in rabbinic law. A rabbinic law that is not accepted by the community at large is rendered void, based on the talmudic principle that "we do not impose strictures on the community that they cannot endure."

While the Bible records the setting up of a monarchy, many of our commentators saw this as a less-than-ideal situation, one modelled on the not-so-noble desire "to be like all the nations around us." Even Maimonides, who saw the establishment of a monarchy as a biblical obligation, states that the king must actually be appointed by the Sanhedrin.

The Sanhedrin, in addition to its role as Jewish People's highest judicial body, is also the representative body of the Jewish People, much like Parliament in Canada or Congress in the United States. The members of the Sanhedrin serve as legislators of Jewish law, in addition to having an interpretive role.

Rabbi Abraham Isaac Hakohen Kook, the first chief rabbi of pre-state Israel, notes that absent a king, the representative body of the Jewish people – i.e., the Knesset – has the legal status of king. In fact, one who rebels against a Jewish king is guilty of a capital offence. The fact that many Jewish leaders don't represent the best that Judaism has to offer is irrelevant. A cursory reading of the Bible will aptly demonstrate that compared with many of our kings, our current political leaders look like paragons of virtue, and their authority is to be respected and followed.

Historically, Jewish communities were governed by elected bodies (usually consisting of seven people) whose duty was to represent their communities to the governing authority. They could pass binding legislation and set tax policy (and the means to enforce it), and they ran a parallel but independent court system. Traditionally, communal policy was set by lay leaders, with rabbis serving as spiritual leaders, but having little authority on the running of the community. Spiritual leaders were, in fact, elected by the community, and it was extremely rare for a son to inherit the rabbinic position of his father.

Living in a democracy means a fundamental shift in our relationship to government. In pre-modern times, Jews were obligated to follow the laws of the monarch, even when the citizens lacked basic rights. Taxes went to enrich the king and not to provide services for "taxpayers." Nonetheless, we were obligated to pay.

In a democracy, our relationship to one another is that of equals. All citizens, including government officials, are considered to be partners and must pay their fair share to keep the business – i.e., the country – running smoothly.

The obligation to vote is so basic to being a responsible citizen that the late Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, the foremost halachic authority to grace America's shores, ruled that one may even enter a house of idolatry (though not the actual sanctuary) to cast a ballot.

Participating in the democratic process is not just an act of responsible citizenship, it's one of responsible Judaism.

Slichot – old and new

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"King David was anguished when he prophetically foresaw the destruction of the Holy Temple and the cessation of the offering of the sacrifices. 'How will the Jews atone for their sins?' he wondered. God replied: 'When suffering will befall the Jews because of their sins, they should gather before me in complete unity. Together they shall confess their sins and recite the order of the Slichot, and I will answer their prayers.'" – Midrash. [tinyurl.com/slichotmidrash]

On Sunday, Sept. 21, just after midnight, people will travel to their synagogues. And they will continue to return very early every weekday until Yom Kippur. They will come to take stock of their behaviour over the past year and prepare themselves for the coming one – and to recite Slichot.

The central phrase in the Slichot service is the recitation of the 13 Attributes of Mercy, which were spoken as Moses received the second set of tablets at Mount Sinai. [tinyurl.com/ slichot1] "God passed by before [Moses] and proclaimed, 'Merciful God, merciful God, powerful God, compassionate and gracious, slow to anger, and abundant in kindness and truth. Preserver of kindness for thousands of generations, forgiver of iniquity, wilful sin and error, and Who cleanses." (Exodus 34:6) [tinyurl.com/slichot2]

Rabbi Yitzchak Berkowitz asks why we spend so much effort reciting God's attributes. Shouldn't we focus on our own spiritual growth rather than invoking this phrase? He then suggests that in order to grow, we need to make sure our own lifestyles reflect these Godly attributes. "For example, the Talmud says that if you are patient with others, then God will be patient with you. You can only demand that God employ all these attributes if you apply them in your own relationships." [tinyurl.com/aish13]

For some Jews, Slichot have already started. Sephardim have been rising early since the start of the month of Elul and will continue to do so for 40 days (excluding Shabbat) until Yom Kippur. You can read a description of what it is like to arrive bleary-eyed early mornings at San Francisco's Magain David Sephardim Congregation. [tinyurl.com/slichotsephard] They don't look too sleepy at Rabbi Avraham Benhaim's minyan. You can peek in on his Sephardi Slichot via YouTube. [tinyurl.com/slichotvid]

Rabbi Benhaim's service seems quaint compared to the one held in Be'er Sheva for 15,000 early morning Slichot participants. [tinyurl.com/slibeer7]

There are some variations to Slichot liturgy between various Jewish communities. You can download the entire 199-page Chabad Slichot book in Hebrew only. Unless you are fluent, you may want to purchase a book with translation to better appreciate the significance of these prayers. [tinyurl.com/slichotchabad]

Rabbi Mark Hurvitz of Congregation Etz Chaim in Ramona, Calif., has taken many of the concepts of Slichot and given them a modern spin. His "Slichot Grid Worksheet" looks like a bingo card, except that the squares contain comments such as "I have done things to others that I would not want done to myself" or "I've said, 'I won't.' But then did." The goal is to ask people to sign a square that is true about themselves and presumably promote discussion about repentance and forgiveness. [tinyurl. com/5swk3]

For more practical suggestions about getting yourself into shape, check out Aish HaTorah's Growth Worksheet. [tinyurl. com/slichotsheet] The Union for Reform Judaism has created several downloadable booklets about Slichot, which use textual study, meditations, plays and music to get the message across. [urj.org/holidays/highholidays]

Larry Mark, editor of JewishFilm.com, has created a list of films for Slichot-time viewing. About The Quarrel, Mark comments, "Two men meet in a park in a rainstorm. They chose different paths. Can forgiveness be reached?" For Crimes and Misdemeanors, he says, "One of Woody Allen's best is a jumping-off point to discuss sins and getting caught, choices, consequences, the lack of consequences, acceptance, and human nature." And here's his take on Bill Murray's Groundhog Day. "Repeating past mistakes over and over… until tshuvah is made." [tinyurl. com/3zdyl]

Blessed to have been Emil Fackenheim's student

By ROBERT ELI RUBINSTEIN

Guest Voice

Rare is the individual blessed with a teacher so compellingly brilliant and intellectually courageous as to exert a transformative effect on his life. Having been privileged to be Prof. Emil Fackenheim's student for many years, I see myself as such an individual.

I first encountered Fackenheim in 1966 as an undergraduate at the University of Toronto, where he was a not-yet-famous professor in the department of philosophy. By no means did he fall into the category of charismatic spell-binding orator: his voice was gravelly, and his German accent was almost impenetrably thick. But once I learned to focus on what he was actually saying, I could not imbibe enough of his wisdom.

Emil (as almost everyone called him) was just then beginning to reflect in a profound way about the impact of the Holocaust on Jewish thought – he was one of the very first scholars to do so, two decades after the fact. As a child of survivors struggling to come to terms with the unspeakable tragedy that had devastated my own family, I was galvanized by Emil's groundbreaking insights.

By the following year, in the wake of the Six Day War, he was radically reconsidering his classical German Reform background. Having posited his now-celebrated "614th commandment" for Jews of our time, "Thou shalt not grant Hitler posthumous victories," Emil became an impassioned Zionist and developed a newfound respect and appreciation for the curative moral power of Jewish tradition and ritual.

It was particularly exciting for a young man from a conventional yeshiva background to be in the presence of a strikingly original thinker in the process of redefining himself as a Jew. For his part, Emil was touched to have a religiously observant, kippah-wearing student, and he took a special interest in me. He checked on me regularly to see if things were going well, and he made it clear that I should not hesitate to call him whenever I felt the need. I was often invited to his home on Briar Hill Avenue for Shabbat dinner with his wife Rose, his children Suzy and David, and an invariably fascinating tableful of guests.

Mainly because of Emil's impact on my intellectual development, I decided to major in philosophy, and I took every course taught by him. Although tempted to pursue graduate studies elsewhere, I decided to stay at U of T, primarily so that I could continue to study with Emil and have him serve as my doctoral supervisor.

By then, Emil Fackenheim had emerged as one of the most original and influential Jewish thinkers in the world. Unfailingly modest and unassuming, he never allowed this fact to go to his head. He was very conscious of the paradoxical weaknesses in his knowledge of Judaism, and he did not hesitate to address them openly. The rabbinical education he received at the Hochschule fur die Wissenschaft des Judentums in Berlin, just before it was shut down by the Nazis, was lacking in certain basic areas that became important to him later in his life. Aware of my Orthodox background, he often asked me elementary questions regarding Jewish law and practice. He was troubled by his poor comprehension of Hebrew, and he did me the great honour of asking me to help him develop his reading skills. The most memorable highlight of my years as Emil's student was the hour I spent with him on Wednesday afternoons reading and translating Hebrew texts.

Emil Fackenheim

He reciprocated in many ways. For example, early on, he introduced me to the thought of Franz Rosenzweig, then virtually unknown in the English-speaking world. He lent me his personal copy of Nachum Glatzer's book about Rosenzweig, the only one at the time in English and long out of print, on the strict condition that I return it to him. I devoured the book, and immediately came to share Emil's view that Franz Rosenzweig was the most important Jewish thinker of the 20th century.

Emil recommended me warmly for a part-time teaching position in the new Jewish studies program at U of T, in the formation of which he had played an instrumental role. For more than a decade, I balanced the academic life with work in my family's real estate business. In the end, the businessman in me won out over the teacher. I know that Emil was deeply disappointed with my career choice, but ever the perfect gentleman, he never said a word.

Robert Eli Rubinstein is a former student of Emil Fackenheim who lives and works in Toronto.

Rabbinical court director holds out hope for agunot

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Israeli agunot have more reason to be hopeful about receiving a get – a Jewish divorce – from their recalcitrant husbands than they did a decade ago, according to the general director of the Rabbinical Courts of Israel.

Rabbi Eliyahu Ben-Dahan – speaking last Wednesday at the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill on "Halachic solutions to the problems of get and agunot" – said that, among other measures, the Israeli government now provides a "big" budget to fund private investigators who track down Israeli husbands who have left the country and refuse to give their wives a Jewish divorce.

An agunah – literally, a "chained woman" – cannot remarry under Jewish law.

In Israel, the rabbinical courts have sole authority over Jewish marriage and divorce. Civil marriage ceremonies and divorce under civil law do not exist.

However, the courts' authority doesn't extend to the Diaspora. Even when they find recalcitrant Israeli husbands in North America, Australia, Europe or Africa, "we need to convince them to give the get," said Rabbi Ben-Dahan.

"Sometimes they agree and come to the bet din in the Diaspora, or send a get with the shaliach [messenger], and then we can finish this story."

But, in other cases, Israeli rabbis are involved, crossing the ocean to convince the husbands to grant a get.

The strategies appear to be working. Twelve years ago, there were about 500 Israeli agunot in situations involving husbands who had left the country. Today, there are about 20, the rabbi said.

In total, in Israel, there are about 200 cases a year in which a get is not granted after two years, he said. About 10,000 gets are granted there every year.

If both spouses want a divorce, "it's easy," said Rabbi Ben-Dahan. "You can finish it in a few days."

But in cases of agunot, when both spouses remain in Israel, the rabbinical courts have other options.

Citing a variety of rabbinical sources, Rabbi Ben-Dahan listed a number of halachically acceptable options short of actually "forcing" a husband to grant a get.

Traditional sanctions – which he noted may not carry weight with husbands today – include refusing to count a man in a minyan (the traditional prayer quorum of 10 men), to refuse to teach his children Torah, or to refuse to bury him in a Jewish cemetery.

A little more than a decade ago, the Israeli Knesset agreed to pass a law to give the rabbinical courts more power in such cases, Rabbi Ben-Dahan said.

Rabbi Eliyahu Ben-Dahan

"In some cases, we can take away the driver's licence of the husband… or we can close his bank account or his credit card. If he works for the government, we can fire him until he gives a get."

In one case, a doctor in northern Israel had his medical licence revoked by the Ministry of Health. Ten days later, he granted his wife a get, the rabbi said.

The use of prenuptial agreements as a tool to prevent women from becoming agunot is common in the Diaspora, and is increasing in Israel, Rabbi Ben-Dahan said.

"In Israel, we cannot force a couple to make a prenuptial agreement, but we advise them [to do so] if they ask."

The agunah issue is "one of the most sensitive issues of our times," said Rabbi Amram Assayag, spiritual leader of the Sephardic Kehila Centre. "It consumes the rabbanim."

Rabbi Ben-Dahan's talk was held to benefit Tzvia, an Israeli educational network for religious girls with 30 schools that combine Judaism, Zionism and academic education.

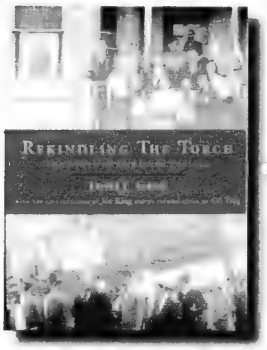
Book chronicles history of Zionism in Canada

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Fifty years before the creation of the State of Israel, the first formal Zionist organization, Agudath Zion, was founded at a mass meeting held in Montreal's B'nai Jacob Synagogue. It was 1898, just a year after the First Zionist Congress in Switzerland.

Members of Canada's small 19th-century Jewish community were among the earliest to enthusiastically embrace the belief that the time had come for their people to be restored to their ancient homeland in Palestine. The passion was not only building in the big cities, but in towns like Glace Bay, N.S., Saint John, N.B., and Brandon, Man., where Jews were scattered.

David Azrieli's new book Rekindling the Torch: The Story of Canadian Zionism (Key Porter Books) provides a comprehensive overview of this love affair from the first stirrings of Jewish nationalism to today's sophisticated fundraising and advocacy for Israel.



Canadian Jews – and a significant number of non-Jews – played a disproportionate role, the book seeks to show, in the long struggle for a Jewish state and in defending and supporting the new country in its fragile early years.

Azrieli, 86, is a past president of the Canadian Zionist Federation, a leading philanthropist and a major commercial builder in Israel since the mid-1980s (the Azrieli Center in Tel Aviv is the tallest structure in the Middle East).

The story is put in the context of great events: World War I, the building of the Yishuv (the pre-state Jewish community), rising anti-Semitism and the embargo of Jewish refugees, World War II and the Holocaust, the struggle for Israel's independence and the evolution of the Canadian Jewish community ever since.

The book, written in collaboration with Joe King and introduced by Gil Troy, contains numerous archival photos and other illustrations, and the central narrative is enlivened by sidebar anecdotes.

Troy, a McGill University American history professor, refers to Canada as "The Little Engine that Could" of the Zionist world. Early on it seems, Canadian Jews – immigrants, for the most part – were more comfortable about expressing their yearning for a Jewish homeland than their U.S. counterparts. He writes that Jewish Canadian Zionists "easily reconciled their enthusiasm for their adopted home with their passion for their people and the Jewish state."

Rekindling the Torch makes sense of the myriad Zionist and other Jewish organizations that sprang up across the country, while highlighting the leading personalities of the movement. No figure loomed as large in the mid-20th century Canadian Zionism as liquor magnate Sam Bronfman, who was not, initially at least, an ardent Zionist.

The fever for an Israel was not caught only by Jews. The right of the Jewish people to return to their ancient homeland was also embraced by many Canadian Christians, especially Protestants, from the late 19th century onward, and many Canadian political figures openly shared the Zionist vision.

Liberal prime minister Wilfred Laurier declared his hope for the realization of the Zionist ideal at a Zionist gathering in 1906. Conservative prime minister R.B. Bennett launched the 1934 United Palestine Appeal in a nationwide radio address.

Azrieli extols Supreme Court justice Ivan C. Rand and prime minister Lester Pearson as prenatal "godfathers" to the State of Israel for their role at the United Nations.

Canadian Zionism officially became a national movement in 1899, when the Federation of Zionist Societies of Canada was formed under the presidency of Clarence de Sola, a position he held until 1919.

Although women did not yet have the vote, they were among the Zionist pioneers. One of the hardest working early Canadian Zionists was Lillian Freiman of Ottawa, who crossed the country raising funds for displaced Jews after World War I.

For decades, the main purpose of Canadian Zionism was to support Jews living in Palestine or from elsewhere who needed refuge, and later to press for Jewish statehood. It was not until 1950 that the Canadian Zionists officially endorsed aliyah by Jews living in Canada, and then, only for youth.

Eight thousand Canadians have moved to Israel since its founding 60 years ago, according to this book.

Rekindling the Torch pays special tribute to the more than 250 Canadians who volunteered to fight in the 1948 War of Independence and to the Jewish community's efforts to procure and ship desperately-needed arms – often underground – for the nascent state.

Recruiting was also clandestine. According to the book, the RCMP was watching the drive being conducted among the thousands of Jewish veterans of World War II.

Canadian Jewry's material contributions during Israel's infancy was, on a per capita basis, twice that of its American counterpart, Azrieli writes.

The book also names the approximately 20 other Canadians who have been killed in other wars in Israel or, more frequently, in terrorist attacks.

Nanny workshop offers High Holiday training

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

With Rosh Hashanah just around the corner, Jewish families are about to start one of the busiest times of year.

There are synagogue arrangements to make, elaborate meals and family gatherings to organize and prepare, and many more extra responsibilities.

For families with in-home caregivers, the High Holidays can often be especially demanding, as nannies often require a fair bit of education to prepare them for all the festivities.

Will include information on customs and traditions

In an effort to make the celebrations easier for nannies and families, a new company is working in concert with Jewish agencies to provide High Holiday training workshop.

"Rosh Hashanah is a very busy time, and most people cannot spare even a moment to stop and teach their nannies about what the holidays are all about," says Kim Faber, director of Child Care Consulting (CCC), which will be facilitating the class.

"With the workshop, our hope is that the nannies' employers won't have to be constantly teaching their nannies what to do for the holidays, and the whole experience can be comfortable and enjoyable for everyone."

The session, which will be hosted at the Family Resource Center, a joint project of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, Jewish Family & Child and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, will be multi-faceted.

It will begin with a brief lecture explaining the history of the holiday, as well as information on customs and traditions, followed by holiday-friendly activities that nannies can share with children.

The nannies will then taste traditional delicacies such as brisket, gefilte fish and pomegranate.

"It can be challenging for a nanny to be in a new country and suddenly, they are taking part in an unfamiliar tradition," says Fran Chodak, supervisor of the Family Resource Centre.

"This workshop will give them the opportunity to be amongst their peers, in a non-threatening way, where they will be prepared for the changes that will take place in their host families. It is one of the many ways we are looking to support and provide programs to caregivers."

To that end, the Family Resource Centre has put on a variety of caregiver workshops, including on such topics as immigration and labour, and fun activities to share with children.

CCC provides a diverse array of services, including education and training, as well as home visits and performance appraisals, to ensure quality care and contribute to the professional development of caregivers.

"Our goal is to improve the quality of care provided to children and their families," says Faber, who has worked in child care for 15 years.

"And the best way to do that is to provide nannies with guidance, tools and knowledge, so they can give the best care possible."

The High Holiday workshop will be held Sept. 22 at the Family Resource Centre, located on the third floor of the Promenade Mall in Thornhill. Nannies or their employers can register by calling 905-882-8509.

Remember La Bamba? The Lion Sleeps Tonight? Under the Boardwalk? Will You Still Love Me Tomorrow?

Those of us who grew up in the 1950s and '60s have nostalgic memories of listening and dancing to those songs and others like them.

A doo-wop concert – Music from the Past for the Future of the Children – will bring those days back. The event, which takes place in the George Weston Recital Hall at the Toronto Centre for the Arts Sept. 25, also includes a reception with kosher food.

Featured artists are Jay Siegel and the Tokens, Charlie Thomas of the Drifters, and Shirley Alston Reeves, the original singer of the Shirelles.

The event will raise funds for the mother-child unit of the Shabtai Levi Home in Haifa. (Shabtai Levi was a mayor of Haifa in the 1920s.) The home is an emergency and residential facility for children, from three days old to age seven, who have been abused or neglected.

The home opened in 1945 as a day-care centre for children of Jewish Brigade soldiers who had fought in Europe, and soon afterward expanded to serve physically or emotionally abused children.

Ellen Goldstein, founding chair of Canadian Friends of Shabtai Levi Home, said that originally the children came through the court system and were cared for and rehabilitated until they could go to foster or adoptive homes.

A new program, which she said has been very effective, is the home's mother-child unit. Here, the children and their mothers stay together. The mothers learn parenting skills and have the opportunity to bond with their offspring.

A mother and child can stay for 14 months, Goldstein said. Then they are evaluated, and a decision is made as to whether they can leave or should stay longer.

"Studies have shown that children do much better being with their own family, rather than in foster care," Goldstein said.

The program has been so successful, she said, that there is a waiting list of childen whom Shabtai Levi wants to serve. The staff would also like to open more facilities like Shabtai Levi.

Goldstein, along with her event co-chairs Maya Grad, Esther Michaels and Cynthia Small, are part of a longtime women's Torah class led by Channa Sargon.

Sargon was close friends with the original director of the Shabtai Levi Home, Nitza Bendor. When Sargon decided to take her students to Israel to see the places they had learned about in the Torah, she also took them to Shabtai Levi.

[illegible] and Michaels visited Shabtai Levi on a recent trip. Grad said she was "incredibly touched by the way the staff cared for the children," many of whom were still miserable from a case of chicken pox, at the time.

So far, more than $600,000 has been raised.

Music from the Past for the Future of the Children starts with a reception at 6:30 p.m., and the concert begins at 8 p.m. Admission is by a minimum donation of $180 per person.

Children's asthma attacks spike in September

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The Asthma Society of Canada is launching a campaign to deal with the annual spike in hospitalization caused by children's asthma attacks on the 17th or 18th day of school.

The program, Preventing the September Asthma Peak, for children in grades 4 to 6, has produced materials for students, teachers and parents, as well as lesson plans that complement the Ontario school curriculum.

Dr. Mark Greenwald, a spokesperson for the society and chair of its medical and science committee, is a professor in the faculty of medicine at the University of Toronto and has a private practice dealing with allergies.

Dr. Mark Greenwald

Eighty per cent of asthma cases are due to the rhinovirus, he said – in other words, the common cold. "The [best] way to avoid this is to make sure that children with asthma, and their friends, teachers and parents wash their hands."

There are other reasons that the spike in asthma attacks occurs, Greenwald said. For one thing, during the summer, many people become lax not only in taking their medications but also in filling their prescriptions.

Many people simply don't achieve control of their asthma, he said, defining "control" as not coughing or wheezing, not waking up at night coughing or wheezing and not losing time at school or work because of the condition.

Asthma, Greenwald stressed, seriously affects quality of life. "It is the most common cause of hospitalization of children, 80 per cent of whom are diagnosed before the age of five. Even a mild case can become serious, sometimes leading to death."

People sometimes back off treatment too soon, he noted. "You must not only gain control, but maintain it," he said.

Greenwald described an experiment he conducts with groups of children. He has the first row of youngsters stick their hands in a bowl of glitter. Then they turn around and shake hands with the child behind them. That child gets glitter on his or her hand and then turns to shake hands with the child behind. It takes many rows of handshakes until no more glitter, standing in for cold germs, is passed.

There also appears to be some genetic component to asthma, he said.

A study of 70,000 people in Belarus showed that, contrary to a popular belief, breast feeding does not prevent it.

Current scientific thought is that there is a definite relationship between those who develop allergies and those with asthma, Greenwald said.

In a Scandinavian study, children who had shown signs of allergies were treated with allergy shots. "Ten years later, less than half of those who statistically might have been expected to develop asthma did so," he said.

In Israel, the number of children with asthma is much the same as anyplace else, he said. However, he added that peanut allergies are not as commonplace there as in North America. Rather, one sees allergies to sesame and to olive tree pollen.

Hebrew U to expand medical research

By RITA POLIAKOV
Special to The CJN

The Hebrew University of Jerusalem will expand its institute for medical research thanks to $50 million in funding from Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU.)

About six months ago, CFHU, a national, non-profit organization that supports Hebrew U, pledged to donate $50 million to the university over the next 10 years. The money will allow the medical institute to finally finish erecting its new building and bring all its research arms under one roof, and it will allow it to restructure itself to encourage innovation.

"We are the largest medical institution in Israel. Our scientists are really outstanding scientists," said Prof. David Lichtstein, the newly appointed chairman of the institute, which has been renamed to the Institute for Medical Research-Israel Canada (IMRIC). "[The institute] has not been thought about or changed for 40 to 50 years. There was stagnation going on. It wasn't shaken up. From a physical point of view, we didn't have any construction or renovations."

While construction of a new building began years ago, only two floors were built when construction ground to a halt. Since then, the building, located on Hebrew U's Ein Kerem campus and called the Octav and Marcela Botnar Research Building, has remained unchanged.

"Hebrew University decided it's time to make some progress," Lichtstein said during a recent visit to Canada. "I would say it was an idea that was there for a long time. We have a very aggressive dean, when he thinks something, it has to be achieved. The president made a decision [and decided that] this is where [the university's] priorities should be."

The university began to look overseas for funding, and the CFHU responded. Merle Goldman, associate national director of CFHU, said the organization was looking for a project that was important for both the university and Canada.

"This will impact the world at large. It will affect mankind," Goldman said. "It's exciting, innovative, cutting edge and relevant."

The IMRIC receives around $18 million of competitive grants every year. Its scientists are skilled and their students are highly successful, yet the department was unable to grow until recently.

CFHU hopes to support IMRIC in a number of ways.

"We will do our best to build research, to help facilitate the building and researchers in Canada, to try to publicize it here, to enhance and strengthen relationships between the committee and donors," Goldman said. "When you develop a relationship with an institution in Israel, you can be aware of how important Israel is to us as Jews."

With CFHU's funding, Lichtstein will develop new infrastructure for the research facility, a change he hopes will help unite faculty and encourage progress.

Currently, the IMRIC is made up of 83 active scientific groups, which will be organized into five departments, some of which have already been established. Each department will focus on specific areas of research.

David Lichtstein, the new chairman of the Institute for Medical Research Israel-Canada at Hebrew University, will receive $50 million over the next 10 years for his department.

Some of these new categories include a department of developmental biology –which will focus on diseases such as fetal alcohol syndrome, diabetes and cancer – and a department of microbiology and infectious diseases, which will focus on diseases such as malaria and mad cow disease.

"It's more effective," Lichtstein said of the new organizational structure, adding that departmental names are tentative. "If you get people working together, you'll get new directions and new perspectives."

About 30 to 33 of the scientific groups will be located in the Botnar building, which should be completed within two years, he said.

Other than construction, CFHU's funds will be put toward academic activities such as purchasing new equipment, organizing seminars and retreats and helping new comers.

When asked where the university would be without the pledge, Lichtstein was very clear.

"Nothing would have changed. We wouldn't be moving, we'd be going backwards."

U of T nursing school receives $500,000 from estate of Bluma Appel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The estate of the late Bluma Appel donated $500,000 to support student awards at the University of Toronto's Lawrence S. Bloomberg Faculty of Nursing earlier this month.

Awards for undergraduate nursing students will get a $300,000 boost, while $200,000 more will be allocated to awards earmarked for graduate students who are interested in exploring a career in pain management, neuroscience or palliative care.

The provincial government's Ontario Trust for Student Support fund will match the donation, making the total $1 million.

Bluma Appel

Appel, who was 87 years old when she died of lung cancer in July 2007, just days after celebrating her 67th wedding anniversary, was a well-known activist and philanthropist.

The daughter of Russian-Jewish parents, Appel was born and raised in Montreal, where she founded CANFAR, the Canadian Foundation for AIDS Research, in 1987.

She was a big supporter of theatre and the arts, donating generously and often to the performing arts in Canada.

Appel was also known to support health-related causes in Canada.

In 2003, during the SARS epidemic, Appel was inspired by the nurses who risked their own health to contain the outbreak.

In 2006, she donated $350,000 to help fund a state-of-the-art training lab at U of T's nursing faculty. The Clinical Simulation Learning Centre, named in Appel's honour, contains an isolation room for infectious disease training.

Later that year, she received a joint honorary degree from U of T's faculty of arts and sciences and the Lawrence S. Bloomberg Faculty of Nursing.

This year, a little more than a year since her death, Appel's estate has set aside half of a million dollars in honour of Jeannie Butler, a registered nurse, a volunteer with U of T's faculty of nursing, and Appel's longtime friend.

In a statement, Butler said that Appel "was a champion of nurses. We hope these awards will attract more people to the profession, and help retain them because we need them."

"They are the same people who condemned me when I stand beside the Dalai Lama, when I cut off aide to Hamas, when I took a tough line [on] Zimbabwe, when we refused to participate in the Durban II conference," he said.

Harper made no direct reference to the Oct. 14 election date falling on the first day of Sukkot, but he said he chose the date so that it wouldn't interfere with the upcoming Francophonie summit, scheduled to take place in Quebec City from Oct. 17 to 19.

Some 300 supporters, press and security personnel gathered at the Villa Colombo – a retirement home located near Dufferin Street and Lawrence Avenue in Eglinton-Lawrence, which is currently held by longtime Liberal MP Joe Volpe – to listen to Harper speak about the Conservative platform and its various planks on tax reform, support for Canadian troops in Afghanistan, child support and fiscal responsibility.

Also on hand was a group of Jewish women sporting aprons with the slogan "Bubbies for Harper." Harper posed with the group for the evening's opening photo op with the media.

The prime minister also spoke briefly in French, touting his government's success in stopping the rancour between the country's sovereigntists and federalists – a reference to his 2006 statement in the House of Commons where he acknowledged Quebec as a nation within Canada.

He also took a swipe at the Liberal party's "Green Shift" proposal, saying "the last thing [Canadians] need is a tax that will make everything more expensive."

In a nod to Toronto, Harper said that if re-elected, his government would back the city's bid for the 2015 Pan-Am games.

But the biggest cheers were reserved for Harper's statements of his unflagging support for Israel.

"You should also ask yourselves... Who do you trust to be a voice for freedom, human rights, democracy and the rule of law in the Middle East or anywhere else in the world?" Harper asked rhetorically before ending his address.

During his talk, he suggested that he isn't confident of winning the election, telling supporters they shouldn't be "fooled" by the polls, because the vote could go "either way."

After Harper left the microphone, the Conservative candidate for York Centre, former B'nai Brith Canada president Rochelle Wilner, thanked him, saying, "examples of your unwavering support for the Jewish community are legend and legion."

Campaign Briefs

The Liberal candidate for Whitby-Oshawa offered an apology last week for remarks he made likening Prime Minister Stephen Harper to Hitler in e-mails he sent out to constituents in 2007.

Brent Fullard sent out mass e-mails with the subject lines "Heil mein Harper" and "Thyssen steel... supporting Hitler's rise to power," which was about a business group's support for Harper.

"My mistake was inexcusable," Fullard said in a statement. "These comments are hurtful to the millions of people who suffered and were killed by the Nazis and to those who remember them."

Canadian Jewish Congress said that it helped secure the apology from Fullard.

Also last week, Jewish community members across the country began receiving Rosh Hashanah greeting cards from Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

The cards say "L'Shana Tova U'Metuka" ("Have a Sweet and Happy New Year") and contain a photo of Harper and his family.

Readers called The CJN to report on this activity, with some expressing confusion, and others anger, over how the Conservative party obtained mailing addresses for Jewish constituents.

A spokesperson for the Conservatives told the paper that every year the party sends Rosh Hashanah greetings to its Jewish supporters and organizers and also compiles a list of additional Jewish people who "might like to receive a card" based on suggestions from those same supporters and organizers.

"We do not use any prepared lists," the spokesperson said, adding that the holiday mail-out was not part of the current election campaign budget because it's done "on a regular basis" each year as a separate item.

Harper also sends out Christmas cards and Chinese New Year cards.

Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, said that the greetings from Harper should be considered by the community as "sincere efforts to reach out to members of the Jewish community," and he said that his organization welcomed them as "a meaningful gesture of respect by a prime minister that recognizes the diversity of Canadians and the multitude of traditions that they embody."

Election 2008

Ex-Blue Bomber targets Liberal incumbent

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies correspondent

WINNIPEG — Former star CFL kicker Trevor Kennerd, who was inducted into the Winnipeg Blue Bomber Hall of Fame in 1997, is running as the Tory candidate in Winnipeg South Centre, seeking to unseat incumbent Liberal MP Anita Neville, who is Jewish.

Trevor Kennerd

The race between Neville and Kennerd, in a riding that has a significant number of Jewish voters, is expected to be tight.

In the 2006 election, Neville garnered 39 per cent of the vote, defeating Conservative Mike Richards, who received 32 per cent. Unlike Richards, Kennerd is a popular former sports figure in Winnipeg, as well as a resident of the riding, which has a population of 78,286 with 59,971 registered voters and 159 polling divisions.

The riding's Jewish population stands at approximately 8,000.

Anita Neville

Neville was first elected as MP for the riding in 2000, and she was re-elected in 2004 and 2006. She serves as the Liberal critic for Indian Affairs and Northern Development and has previously acted as chair of the standing committee on the status of women. She is also a co-chair of the group Liberal Parliamentarians For Israel.

In an interview with The CJN, Neville said that "as a result of the work of the Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel, [Liberal leader] Stéphane Dion made recommendations regarding the need for security for [ethnic] communities, such as the Jewish community, who may be at risk from attacks. Mr. Dion has promised to allocate $75 million towards this, which would include security that synagogues require during High Holidays, and security for Jewish community centers. The Tories have made a commitment for this of a paltry sum of $650,000, which is no way near enough."

Kennerd said he is very familiar with the Jewish community and its concerns.

"On a professional level, a number of years ago, I met [former shaliach] Rami Kleinmann of the Jewish National Fund and my [marketing communications] company, TKM Inc., was hired to do the public relations for the Negev Gala, which I have been doing for the last number of years," he said.

"Through that, I have met some wonderful people in the Jewish community. My company produces all of the promo material for the JNF's Tu b'Shvat dinner, and the JNF's High Holidays appeal card."

Kennerd, who visited Israel for five days in 2007, said he strongly supports the state, which he described as "a democratic and law-abiding country."

He said that his "visit to the Yad Vashem [Holocaust museum] in Jerusalem was the most moving part of my visit to Israel. I believe that every Grade 10 and 11 student in the world should be visiting Yad Vashem."

Kennerd said "the notion that Israel ought to negotiate with organizations that support terror, such as Hezbollah and Hamas, is a complete non-starter."

He added: "I am pleased that under Prime Minister [Stephen] Harper's leadership, Canada became the first country in the world to immediately suspend direct aid to the Palestinian Authority when Hamas was elected, because of its refusal to meet the criteria for international legitimacy, including an end to violence and unconditional recognition of Israel."

In contrast to Harper's stance against terror organizations, Kennerd said, in 2002, then-Liberal foreign affairs minister Bill Graham refused to add Hezbollah to the government's list of terror groups, because of the so-called charitable work done by it's political arm.

Neville countered that the idea the Liberals are soft on terror "is absolutely not true."

She said Dion has "made it clear that the Liberals will continue to condemn terror from whatever source, for whatever purpose and in whatever form."

On the subject of potential terrorist attacks in Canada, Kennerd said, "We have a government in Ottawa that recognizes that terrorists are a threat to freedom-loving nations everywhere… [Public Safety] Minister Stockwell Day, working through CSIS and the RCMP, is diligently ensuring that terrorist cells do not rise up in Canada, and if they do, to ensure they are rooted out."

With regard to the Oct. 14 election date, Neville said she is displeased with the fact that Harper called the election for the first day of Sukkot.

"I don't like it. I think it's disrespectful. The date was chosen for [Harper's] political advantage, and another date could easily have been chosen," she said.

The Green party candidate for the riding, Vere Scott, could not be reached for comment, and as of last week, the New Democratic Party did not have a candidate nominated in the riding.

OU may revoke Agriprocessors' kosher stamp

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — The filing of criminal charges against the owners of Agriprocessors has prompted the Orthodox Union, one of the meat company's kosher certifiers, to promise it will suspend its kosher supervision unless new management is hired.

The OU's announcement came on Sept. 9, just hours after Iowa's attorney general filed criminal charges against Agriprocessors and its principal owner, Aaron Rubashkin, on more than 9,000 counts of child labour violations related to operations at its plant in Postville.

"Within the coming days – or, let's say, a week or two – we will suspend our supervision unless there's new management in place," Rabbi Menachem Genack, the OU's head of kosher supervision, told JTA. "I hope they're smart enough to recognize that new management is absolutely required."

Agriprocessors' products are also certified as kosher under the label of Rabbi M.M. Weissmandl. Asked if he would follow the OU's lead in suspending supervision, Rabbi Weissmandl demurred.

"My business is kashrut," he told JTA. "As long as the high kosher standards are in place, I'm not removing any hechsher. My business is to make sure that the place is 100 per cent kosher."

The attorney general's complaint represents the first criminal charges to be brought against the company's owners since a May 12 immigration raid resulted in the arrest of nearly 400 illegal immigrant workers in Postville. Each day an underage employee reported for work qualifies as a criminal charge – hence the 9,000 counts – and each is punishable by up to 30 days in jail and a fine.

Rabbi Genack emphasized that the OU would suspend its supervision on the basis of the charges alone and not on a conviction. He also said the Rubashkins could continue to be involved in ownership and operation of the plant and retain OU certification as long as an independent CEO is named.

The criminal complaint and affidavit filed on Sept. 9 in Allamakee County District Court named as defendants Rubashkin and his son Sholom, who managed the Postville plant until late May, and three human resources employees.

The affidavit alleges that the defendants hired five underage workers, retained them as employees and/or concealed their presence during inspections – or assisted in doing those things.

"All of the named individual defendants possessed shared knowledge that Agriprocessors employed undocumented aliens," the affidavit alleges. "It was likewise shared knowledge among the defendants that many of those workers were minors. The company's hiring practices encouraged job applicants to submit identification documents which were forgeries, and known to contain false information as to resident alien status, age and identity."

Agriprocessors issued a statement on Sept. 9 denying the allegations. The company said that underage workers had lied about their age and that their employment was terminated if they were discovered.

"In order to convict, the state is going to have to prove that the defendants wilfully violated the child labour laws," the company said. "That means that the state, as to every one of the alleged violations, is going to have to prove that each defendant knew that the employee was underage on the day in question, and knew that it was against the law for the person to be employed in the manner alleged. The state will not be able to carry this burden of proof."

Rabbi Genack said he was not withdrawing supervision immediately because he wanted to act "responsibly, not precipitously," and with sensitivity toward the company, its employees and kosher consumers.

The OU's threat further jeopardizes the ability of Agriprocessors, which controls a sizable portion of the United State's kosher meat and poultry market, to meet the rising demand that typically accompanies the High Holidays.

Agriprocessors has struggled to restore its production capacity since the May 12 raid, when nearly half its workforce was taken into federal custody.

Its competitors already have moved to fill the void. On Sept. 8, a kosher industry publication reported that Empire Kosher, a poultry producer, is entering the kosher meat market.

Rabbi Genack said the OU has been pushing for reforms at Agriprocessors since the May raid, including replacing Sholom Rubashkin as CEO and hiring a compliance officer.

On May 23, the company announced that Sholom Rubashkin would be stepping down from his post, but he remains a presence at the plant and no replacement has been named. Two weeks later, the company hired Jim Martin, a former U.S. Attorney, as compliance officer.

Rabbi Genack also said he was reaching out to various players in a bid to "stabilize" the situation in Postville. He mentioned the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, which he said could be helpful if it unionized the Postville plant's workers.

Hekhsher Tzedek launches holiday drive

By SUE FISHKOFF
JTA

SAN FRANCISCO — Leaders of the Conservative movement's ethical kashrut certification program are taking their campaign to the next level.

They are inviting Conservative rabbis to sign onto the Hekhsher Tzedek initiative and are meeting with at least one Orthodox kosher certification agency, as well as making initial overtures to selected kosher food producers that might seek the new certification.

"We are moving this forward in the American Jewish community in a very powerful yet sensitive fashion," said Rabbi Morris Allen of Beth Jacob Congregation in Mendota Heights, Minn., Hekhsher Tzedek's project director.

"Doors have opened," he said, since the Hekhsher Tzedek guidelines were released July 31, outlining five areas of ethical and environmental standards against which kosher food producers are to be measured. "People want to talk to us more."

E-mails were sent the week of Aug. 25 to the 1,600 members of the Rabbinical Assembly, the professional association of Conservative rabbis, inviting them to partner with Hekhsher Tzedek in a High Holidays drive.

The e-mail asked rabbis to address Hekhsher Tzedek in their High Holidays sermons, and includes a model sermon and teaching materials. It also commits those who sign on to buy products carrying the Hekhsher Tzedek seal once it is applied, a process that could begin as early as January, according to project co-chair Rabbi Michael Siegel of Anshe Emet Synagogue in Chicago.

"There's been a very positive response," Siegel said. "Rabbis have been looking for a way to get more involved."

Last month, the Reform rabbinical association, the Central Conference of American Rabbis, endorsed Hekhsher Tzedek, calling on Reform Jews to "consider" the initiative's guidelines when making dietary choices.

The materials are being made available to rabbis from other denominations, although the e-mail was sent only to Conservative rabbis.

Rabbi Philip Scheim of Toronto's Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue has already mentioned the issue in sermons and was planning to address it again on Erev Yom Kippur in a broader context before he even received the e-mail.

"Keeping kosher has kept us together as a people," he said in an interview. "If a byproduct is the oppression of innocent people, it calls into question the entire practice. We have to make sure we're not losing sight of the greater [picture]."

Rabbi Barry Starr of Temple Israel in Sharon, Mass., received the appeal Aug. 29. Noting that he has already done "a lot of outreach" about Hekhsher Tzedek within his congregation, Starr said he would "mention" it during the holidays, but it "will not be the sole theme of my sermon."

"Many of my people are already not buying products from Agriprocessors," he said, referring to the kosher meat company whose plant in Postville, Iowa, was the target of a massive immigration raid in May.

Rabbi Scheim said the issue of Agriprocessors per se is bigger in the United States than here. "We do get some of their cold cuts, but not a lot of it. In some parts of the United States, all of the [kosher] meat is supplied by Agriprocessors."

He said he hopes that kosher-certified companies in Canada – a smaller kosher food market – will accept the Hekhsher Tzedek initiative once it is developed further. "If it takes off in the States, at some point there will be a spillover."

Rabbi David Glickman of Congregation Shearith Israel in Dallas told JTA that while he supports Hekhsher Tzedek's focus on the ethical dimensions of kosher food production, he does not know what his 1,200-member congregation will decide to do about the partnership invitation.

"We've come out publicly in support of the concept and for the need for ethical treatment of workers in factories," he said. But, he added, "It's important not to rush to judgment when accusing any particular company."

The Hekhsher Tzedek guidelines are the result of two years of work by a Conservative-sponsored commission that came together after a 2006 investigation of workers' complaints at Agriprocessors.

Since the guidelines were made public, Allen said project leaders and colleagues from Jewish Community Action, a social justice group based in St. Paul, Minn., have been talking to "people inside the kosher industry," including rabbis from Orthodox certification agencies and kosher food companies that might be the first candidates for the Hekhsher Tzedek seal. The seal's design will be released soon, he said.

The commission is testing the metrics developed by KLD Research and Analytics, Inc., an independent investment research firm, to measure how companies behave in five categories: wages and benefits; employee health and safety; product development and animal welfare; corporate transparency; and environmental impact. They are test-marketing the standards with one kosher food producer.

An unintended result of the Agriprocessors raid, Allen said, was that it opened a national dialogue about what kosher means, and brought the politics and ethics of Jewish dietary laws to the front pages of secular newspapers across the country.

"People are really talking about Judaism and dietary habits and the importance of finding kosher food they're comfortable buying," he said. "It's a very powerful thing that is happening."

'Roving rabbis' make connections in Alberta

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

This summer marked the first time in 20 years that Chabad Alberta, in conjunction with Chabad headquarters in New York City, has sent rabbinical students roving over the plains and mountains of Alberta.

Moshe Raices of Postville, Iowa, and Yossi Matusof of Calgary spent three weeks in the province, driving close to 3,000 kilometres as they visited tourist hot spots such as Banff and Lake Louise and quieter centres such as Medicine Hat and Lethbridge in their search for Jewish brethren.

Their purpose? To reconnect with members of the tribe.

"After everything I'd learned and studied at rabbinical school during the year, this was a chance to share my knowledge with people who never have access to it," said Matusof, 20. "I had a few weeks open and thought it would be a great way to spend it, especially because it would put me near Calgary, where I grew up."

Matusof and Raices packed their trunk with kosher food in Calgary, returning intermittently to the city to replenish their supplies.

But it was the variety of touching experiences they had en route that stand out in their memory, not the abundance of tuna sandwiches they consumed.

Matusof recalls an encounter in Banff with a Jewish family from New York, during which he learned that their teenage son had never had a bar mitzvah.

When given the opportunity, the young man opted to put on tfillin for the first time right then and there, on Banff Avenue.

"We did about seven bar mitzvahs in those three weeks, one of them for an 89-year-old man outside the cemetery where his wife was buried," Matusof said.

"There were so many moving moments as we made connections with Jews who had little or no ties to Judaism at all."

The two students were among some 400 "roving rabbis" and rabbinical students who travelled all over the world connecting Jews to Judaism this summer.

There were 15 pairs of rabbinical students in Canada, travelling in Saskatchewan, the Maritimes, Ontario, Quebec and Alberta, according to Mendy Kotlarsky, who helps co-ordinate Chabad's Roving Rabbis program. The program has been ongoing since 1947, with funding from private donors and foundations.

"It's a costly program, but the precise cost depends on where they are going," Kotlarsky said.

"For example, it's more expensive to send the men to Saskatchewan, where they need to rent a car and stay in motels, than it is to send them to Richmond Hill, Ont., where they can stay with a local family."

The criteria to become a "roving rabbi" are dedication, devotion and study at, or graduation from, rabbinical college.

Chabad supplies its own candidates for the program with seminars and material, offering a co-ordinator, website, resources and a whole infrastructure to help them along the way.

"They have to be serious and want to give up their summer for the greater good and assist Jewish communities worldwide," Kotlarsky said. "A lot of times it can be tiring, and you could be living on cans of tuna for a long time. But in a way, this is like a residency for them."

According to Rabbi Menachem Matusof, Yossi's father and the voice of Chabad Alberta, this program is definitely necessary.

"Ideally, I'd need two pairs of rabbinical students to come – one for southern Alberta and one for northern Alberta," he said. "To really do it right, we would need their presence for two to three months in the Canadian Rockies, just for the tourists. But it's an issue of funding, and making it happen."

His son, who will be studying at a yeshiva in Manchester, England, this year, said he returned from the Roving Rabbis assignment enthused and invigorated.

"You just feel how much you've helped and all the people you've touched, knowing at the same time how much there still is to do," he said. "Being part of the Roving Rabbis left us with an urge to return and do everything we can to help out again."

Winnipeg Jewish agencies get small funding increase

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's beneficiary agencies are receiving an increase in their allocations of 2.3 per cent for fiscal 2008-2009.

In a recently released report, the federation's budget and allocation committee noted that Winnipeg's Combined Jewish Appeal campaign last year raised $5,343,051 – an increase of 4.1 per cent over the previous year's campaign. Of that figure, donors designated $1,365,414 for the United Israel Appeal. (Winnipeg's campaign is the only one in North America that combines its UIA campaign with its local one.)

After deducting the federation's operating and financial development expenses ($869,667 last year), the federation's 11 beneficiaries were left with $2,310, 637 for this fiscal year.

The largest recipient of funding once again is the Gray Academy of Jewish Education, a kindergarten-to-secondary school that received $860,000 this year, a $20,000 increase over last year. The school is also being given another $17,000 in designated gifts. (Donors making gifts above a certain minimum can designate part of their donation for specific beneficiaries.)

The Jewish Child & Family Service received the largest increase in its allocation – an increase of $38,000. In total, JCFS was allotted $660,000, as well as $22,000 more in designated gifts and $83,333 for its Vickar Community Assistance Program.

The Rady Jewish Community Centre's allocation of $460,000 was unchanged from 2007-2008.

The Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada received its usual $55,000, as well as a special grant of $35,000 to redevelop its exhibit space.

The other federation beneficiary organizations include the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre for seniors and its kosher Meals on Wheels program; Camp B'nai Brith and Camp Massad; the Aleph Bet Day Care; the independent Ohr Hatorah Day School (Orthodox) and Temple Shalom Religious School (Reform), and the Shalom Residences for developmentally challenged Jewish adults.

"I believe that through our allocations process, we have been able to build over the years a high level of engagement and co-operation between the federation and our beneficiary organizations," said Gustavo Zentner, a federation vice-president and chair of the organization's budget and allocations committee. At the same time, Zentner said he feels that the money the federation provides to its beneficiaries doesn't do justice to their contributions to the community. "We would like to be able to provide more money, but we only have so much money to work with," he said.

He said the federation is working with its beneficiary agencies to help them develop long-term plans concerning their financial needs.

"I commend the organizations on being proactive in identifying alternate sources of funding such as government grants and international foundations. If they had to rely only on what the federation was able to give them, some of them wouldn't be able to survive."

Bonds head leaves before holiday drive

By RHONDA SPIVAK

WINNIPEG — Although Ariel Karabelnicoff, executive director of Israel Bonds in Winnipeg, left the organization at the end of August, the traditional Rosh Hashanah appeal for bonds purchases will take place as usual, Bonds officials say.

Karabelnicoff worked for Israel Bonds for two years, and during that time, the total value of bond purchases in the city climbed significantly, reaching $3 million.

Yona Gazit, Bonds' national executive vice-president, said that Israel Bonds wishes Karabelnicoff "the best of luck in his new position [with Oreck Canada]. It's our intention to look for a replacement for him. In the meantime, we will ensure that there will be someone to administer the [annual Rosh Hashanah] campaign. I can't tell you who, because I don't know yet."

Although he acknowledged that "the situation is not ideal," Gazit emphasized that "sales in Winnipeg are going on and are clients are being served."

He added that "clients can reach us through our 1-800 number or through our website, and service will be given."

Gazit said Bonds has not decided whether it will hire a part-time or full-time employee for its Winnipeg office. He noted that prior to Karabelnicoff being hired, the office was staffed for many years on a part-time basis.

Gazit noted that although Bonds doesn't have a staff person or offices in Saskatoon, Regina, or Edmonton, "clients are doing business with us and being served."

"Currently, there is a part-time administrator in our offices in Calgary. We have not had a director in Calgary since our former director retired about a year ago," Gazit said.

Israel Bonds briefly considered merging the Calgary and Winnipeg offices, "but we decided against it as we didn't think our clients could effectively be served," Gazit added.

"Although in the United States, quite a few offices of Israel Bonds have merged or closed, it is not on our agenda to do this in Winnipeg," he said.

Quebec firms heading to Israel

MONTREAL — Representatives of more than 35 Quebec firms, many in the high tech and biotechnology fields, as well as of research institutes and investment funds, are scheduled to accompany Economic Development Minister Raymond Bachand on a trade and scientific mission to Israel Sept. 21-24.

Among them are the Fonds de solidarité of the Quebec Labour Federation, the law firms Heenan Blaikie and Ogilvy Renault, aircraft engine maker Pratt & Whitney Canada, computer software developer MDA Corporation, pharmaceutical technology company Pharma Laser, and McGill University, Université Laval, Université de Montréal, Université du Québec à Trois-Rivières, and the Fonds de la recherché en santé du Québec.

The goals of the mission include strengthening Quebec exports to Israel, promoting venture-capital investments, and fostering collaboration between researchers in each country.

The group will visit Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and Haifa to meet political and business leaders, as well as visit research centres.

Israel is currently Quebec's fourth-largest market in the Middle East, with exports valued at $96 million last year. Quebec imported $184 million in goods from Israel in 2007.

The Quebec government is promoting Israel as an interesting trading partner because of its rapidly growing economy. Israel's gross domestic product increased by five per cent last year.

"Creativity, audacity and competence – Quebec possesses all of the attributes to succeed in Israel," Bachand said in a statement. "The business and research organization representatives participating in the mission are leaders in their respective fields."

Jewish groups meet Ste. Agathe mayor

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Jewish community delegation suggested to Ste. Agathe-des-Monts Mayor Laurent Paquette that educating children in cultural diversity might have prevented an apparently hate-motivated incident like the one that occurred in the Laurentian town last month.

The delegation, led by Canadian Jewish Congress' Quebec region president Victor Goldbloom, included Rabbi Emanuel Carlebach, spiritual leader of the House of Israel Congregation in Ste. Agathe, and Rabbi Chalom Chriqui, director of a kosher holiday resort in Ste. Agathe, and D'Arcy McGee MNA Lawrence Bergman, who owns a vacation home in the town, in addition to several CJC officials.

The meeting at the town hall lasted more than one hour.

CJC also met in Montreal with the area's police chief, Capt. Gilbert Lafrenière of the provincial Sûreté du Québec (SQ).

Goldbloom said after the meetings that he felt both men are taking very seriously the Aug. 16 assault of Mendy Haouzi, 23, of Montreal, as he walked to the House of Israel for Shabbat services, as well as the concerns of Rabbi Carlebach and other area Jewish residents that intolerance of Jews, especially those who are visibly Jewish, is growing.

"The meetings were frank, constructive and very satisfying. The mayor and police chief are acting thoroughly responsibly and decently," Goldbloom said.

They, however, do not view the assault as part of a worrisome trend, he added.

"The perception of the mayor and police chief is that this was an isolated incident," Goldbloom said.

He added that Lafrenière told them the investigation into the incident – as well as other non-violent ones that occurred this summer, such as vandalism and break-ins whose motive are unclear – is continuing.

Goldbloom said: "The investigation appears to be taking a little longer than expected, because they want to make sure they have solid evidence before making an arrest."

He also understands that other witnesses besides the victim have made statements to police.

The delegation stressed the need for prevention, especially as those involved in the assault may possibly as young as 13, Goldbloom said.

"It's not enough to say that those responsible should be caught and punished, especially if they are this young," he said. "It is at least as important to sensitize youth to religious and ethnic differences."

Goldbloom thinks that the penalty for the perpetrator or perpetrators of this assault, if a minor is involved, should include community service.

He recalled an incident years ago when five youths from South Shore St. Jean sur Richelieu drove into Montreal and attacked a Chassid on the street. Those found guilty were sentenced to community service, which involved getting to know the Jewish community. Goldbloom, as then-president of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, had a hand in overseeing that the fulfillment of that sentence.

Paquette said afterward that there is a need for more contact between Jews and others. "We've lived together for close to a century, but we don't really know the Jewish community," he said.

CJC hopes to soon also meet with representatives of the local high school and CEGEP to discuss educational ideas, possibly having Jewish community representatives speak there. The two rabbis said they would also like to organize more activities that bring together Jewish and non-Jewish residents together.

Bergman agreed with the educational approach. "This incident is deplorable, but isolated. Any incident of this nature can certainly be treated by education."

A delegation from B'nai Brith Canada, Quebec region, also travelled to the Laurentian town last week for meetings with Claude Cousineau, Member of the National Assembly for Bertrand, as well as with SQ investigator Jean-François Lettre, and with André Bouchard, director general of the Commission scolaire des Laurentides, the local French public school board.

It presented its program "Taking Action Against Hate," a national initiative aimed at building bridges to counter prejudice, for the consideration of the school officials.

The delegation was led by B'nai Brith national legal counsel Steven Slimovitch, and included Rabbi Carlebach and Gerry Phillips, president of the House of Israel.

It's also encouraging Jewish residents of the Ste. Agathe area to report anti-Semitic incidents to is anti-hate hotline at 1-800-892-2624.

The two Jewish groups have a different interpretation of the situation in Ste. Agathe and surrounding towns.

Allan Adel, national chair of its League for Human Rights, believes there has been an escalation of anti-Semitism, expressed both in criminal acts and in harassment of identifiably religious Jews.

But Goldbloom is urging the matter be put in perspective and not be sensationalized.

"Yes, there have been some problems in recent times, relating in particular to the presence of an ultra-Orthodox Jewish community. Yes, last month there was an episode of physical aggression," Goldbloom said.

"The indications are, however, that the perpetrators were a bunch of adolescents, and that they have no support whatsoever in general public opinion. The last three years, particularly, have seen notable progress in interreligious relations in Ste. Agathe."

Haouzi, an engineering student at McGill University, has told the media that a group of youths threw coins at him and his father and half-brothers, aged 11 and 9, who were visiting from France, as they walked on the town's main street.

After speaking with them, one of the youths suddenly slapped and then punched him in the face, causing bleeding and a black eye. The boys then laughed, grabbed his kippah and ran away when they heard him ask a passerby to call the police.

Being observant, the men were not carrying cellphones at the time. Haouzi and his father later filed a report with police.

Three senior union leaders will visit Israel

In 2006, the Ontario wing of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) labelled Israel's security barrier an "apartheid wall" and voted to boycott the state.

Last year, a regional conference of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW) passed a resolution supporting the boycott of Israel and pledging an educational campaign about "the apartheid nature of the Israel [sic] state."

The Canadian Labour Congress, a three-million-strong umbrella organization, has also passed a resolution that critics said was unbalanced, while accusing Israel of state terrorism.

In distancing itself from other labour groups, the Carpenter's union states in the preamble to the resolution that "some trade unions in Canada are attempting to undermine the legitimacy of Israel's democracy."

The preamble also notes Israel is under continuous terrorist threat and "as a democratic society, has an active trade union movement that participates in all areas of Israeli society."

"Unlike many neighbouring countries, Israel has an active trade union movement that participates freely in Israeli society," said Ucal Powell, president of the Carpenters' District Council of Ontario. "Supporting a boycott or sanctions against Israel risks reinforcing terrorist groups and does little to encourage the well-being of workers in the region."

Del Duca called the Carpenters' resolution "balanced, fair and progressive. We recognize that Israel has a flourishing trade union movement and that underlines the things we have in common with Israel. We see a lot of commonality there."

In the days immediately following the resolution, Del Duca said he had received about 100 e-mails, of which 98 per cent were supportive of the union's position.

Del Duca said the conference was addressed following passage of the resolution by Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center.

Benlolo called passage of the resolution "historic" and perhaps a "template for what other unions can do."

He said the Carpenters and Friends enjoy a "tight connection... We have a very close relationship with them," and the Friends had a role in developing the resolution. Three senior union leaders will visit Israel on an educational mission in October, Benlolo added.

In thanking the union for adopting the resolution, Benlolo said he pointed out that "Israel is a democratic country that deserves the right to act as it sees fit, that it wants a resolution with the Palestinians and should not be labelled apartheid and [there should be] no divestment or sanctions.

"Unions, like CUPE Ontario and CUPW, are motivated by extremists lobbying from within and pushing them in that direction. This union [the Carpenters] does not suffer from that. The leaders themselves have a strong attachment to Israel. They just get it."

Benlolo suggested the union may have developed a different perspective on the Middle East as a result of its close relationships with Jewish builders.

According to the State of Israel Bonds Canada's website, more than 1,700 labour unions and numerous union pension funds in North America have invested in Israel Bonds.

Former Bonds Canada executive vice-president Lawrence Waller said this number represents private sector unions across Canada and the United States.

"[These unions] are mainly in the construction industry," he said.

Obituary

Furniture maker was survivor and educator

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Philip Weiss, a survivor who educated thousands of school children in the province about the Holocaust by sharing his painful personal experiences, died Sept. 3 at age 86.

At his funeral, in the packed Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, he was referred to by Rabbi Alan Green and Rabbi Shalom Rappaport as the "Elie Wiesel of Winnipeg."

His younger brother, Leo, who, unlike Weiss, was spared the horrors of the Nazi concentration camps, called him "a sensitive soul," and "an unrelenting champion of those who could not speak for themselves."

"He saw that his mission as a survivor of the Holocaust was to bear witness… He [Weiss] led the campaign to place a Holocaust memorial [statue] on the grounds of the Manitoba legislative building," said his son in-law, Brian Schwartz.

Published book about Holocaust experiences

"This was the first monument of its kind ever erected on public property in Canada," said Weiss' daughter, Francie Winograd.

Weiss was 15 and living at his parent's home in Drohobycz, Poland, when the Nazis seized him and put him in his first concentration camp. He was imprisoned in three labour camps and two concentrations camps during World War II.

The retired award-winning furniture designer and craftsman spoke about the Holocaust at high schools and universities in the city and across the province. Weiss also gave free screenings of the movie Schindler's List to hundreds of children.

He was able to connect to thousands of students, leaving many in tears after they heard his personal story.

He also provided financial assistance to students in the Asper Foundation's Holocaust and Human Rights program, which sends young people to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

Weiss was also given an honorary doctorate by the University of Winnipeg in 2003 for his life's work in educating young people about the Shoah.

There were two numbers Weiss said he never forgot. One was the number that the Nazis tattooed on him – 87226 – and the other was May 5, 1945, the day U.S. troops liberated the Mauthausen concentration camp in Austria where he was being held.

Last year, at age 85, Weiss self-published a book about his experiences in the Holocaust, titled Humanity in Doubt.

Weiss' "will and endurance" saw that this project was completed before he died, Schwartz said.

"On many occasions he [Weiss] rose to say Kaddish for those who had no relatives," Schwartz recalled. "He was a loyal son of his God and his people," a courageous, resilient man "who remained committed to his mission [to bear witness]."

Rabbi Green said that Weiss "was able to transform the darkness of the Holocaust into light."

At the end of the war, Weiss was reunited with his parents, Solomon and Celia, as well as his sister Erna and brother Leo, all of whom survived the Holocaust.

Weiss' family was "one of the few Polish Jewish families to survive [the war] intact," Rabbi Green said.

For several years, Weiss, like many Holocaust survivors, didn't talk about his experiences. "He kept the worst of all of his memories within him, close to his heart," Schwartz said.

Lindor Reynolds, a columnist for the Winnipeg Free Press, wrote about Weiss on Sept. 6.

"This was a real man. This was a survivor determined not to be silenced," Reynolds wrote. "Throughout his life through his determination and his courage, Philip Weiss ensured the terrible facts and lessons of the Holocaust would not be forgotten. Now that he's gone, it's imperative that history and his example not be forgotten."

Besides two daughters, Weiss is survived by seven grandchildren, and his sister and brother. He was predeceased by his wife, Gertrude, and daughter Shelley.

Holiday Food Ideas

From South Africa with love

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Whenever Myrtle and Manny Kagan travelled to Canada from South Africa to stay with their son, Maurice (Meish), and his family, the Thornhill kitchen became a busy place.

Myrtle Kagan was supposed to be the guest, but she always spent a good deal of her time in the kitchen preparing lamb stew, chicken soup and tuna noodle casserole, which was a favourite of her granddaughters, Nina and Danielle, says their mother Ester Kagan.

"South African women are exceptional homemakers, and Mrytle was la crême de la crême," Ester Kagan says. "Everybody in the Jewish community who knew Myrtle in Johannesburg spoke of her great kindness and her amazing cooking.

"Feeding people was one of the many ways Myrtle showed love."

Sadly, Myrtle Kagan was the victim of a random act of violence in Johannesburg. On Feb. 12, she was in the wrong place at the wrong time. She was gunned down in her car and died in hospital shortly after.

Her death devastated the family, Kagan says. "Myrtle found goodness in everyone, which makes the brutality of her death that much more shocking."

Kagan says her late mother-in-law was incredibly generous to others with her time and attention, especially her husband, three children and seven grandchildren. "She adored them and they adored her. She was the most loving person."

The late summer and early fall was usually the time her in-laws visited Toronto. "They always came before Rosh Hashanah. Myrtle would cook up a storm and then she would do holiday cooking with my sister-in-law Sylvia [Roth] in San Diego.

"Her death has left a huge vacuum in all our lives. As my sister-law Sylvia puts it: 'She was always putting the needs of others above her own. Her memory is a blessing and an inspiration.'"

MYRTLE KAGAN'S LAMB STEW

1 large onion, diced
2 lb. lamb shoulder chops, cut up with bone in
3 to 4 tbsp. canola or olive oil for browning
3 cloves garlic, minced
6 carrots cut into chunks
4 potatoes cut into chunks
10-oz. package of frozen peas
1 small tin of tomatoes (approx. 350 ml)
2 tsp. of pareve beef-flavoured gravy thickener
1 tbsp. apricot jam
1/2-1 tsp. each cardamom, curry, cumin (adjust to your taste)
salt and pepper to taste
2 cups water

Heat oil in Dutch oven or heavy pot. Add onions and garlic and brown over medium heat. Remove from pan. Add lamb and brown on all sides. Add onions and garlic. Add spices, gravy thickener and water and cook for 1/2 hour. Add vegetables and tomatoes (with juice). Cover and simmer for about 2 hours. Add more water if necessary. Add peas and jam. Cook another 10 minutes.

Myrtle Kagan

MYRTLE KAGAN'S CHICKEN SOUP

1 chicken
1 chicken carcass
1 turkey thigh
5 sprigs dill
1 medium onion cut in half
6 celery stalks
6-8 carrots, scraped and trimmed
2 parsnips, scraped and trimmed
3 tbsp. chicken soup powder
salt and pepper to taste
water to cover chicken plus 4 cups

Put chicken in large pot. Cover with water and add 4 more cups of water. Bring to a boil. Skim. Add remaining ingredients. Cover and simmer for 3 hours. Strain. Mash carrots and return to soup. Refrigerate. Remove the fat from the top of the soup and discard. Serve with matzah balls and/or noodles.

MYRTLE KAGAN'S TUNA NOODLE CASSEROLE

1 6-oz. can tuna
1 can tomato soup
1 small onion, chopped
1 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 cup light cream
1 cup cheddar cheese, shredded
1 16-oz. package medium egg noodles

Boil noodles and drain. Fry onion in oil until soft, add tuna, tomato soup and cream. Simmer for 15 minutes. Mix noodles with tuna mixture. Pour into casserole dish. Sprinkle with cheese. Bake at 350 for 15 to 20 minutes. Serves 6-8.

CELEBRATE IN STYLE: Rosh Hashanah holiday table (from Entertaining on the Jewish Holidays by Ella Banin)

Gluten-free cooking can be an adventure

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Haley Frydrych, 15, who has celiac disease, has a foolproof way of taking part in holiday meals – she eats Passover food.

Diagnosed about 13 years ago, Haley has a condition in which the absorptive surface of the small intestine is damaged by gluten, a protein found in wheat, rye, tricale and barley, and often in hidden sources that contain starch fillers of unknown origin such as drugs, spices and hydrolyzed vegetable protein.

Eating these substances results in an inability to absorb nutrients such as protein, fat, carbohydrates, vitamins and minerals, which are necessary for good health.

Common symptoms of celiac disease include chronic fatigue, anemia, diarrhea and/or constipation, delayed puberty, bloating, abdominal pain, weight loss, bone or joint pain, and dental abnormalities.

Joni Frydrych, Haley's mother and vice-president of the Canadian Celiac Association, Toronto chapter, said that although there is no cure for celiac disease, treatment is "100 per cent effective, and no drugs or surgery are required. Celiacs must maintain a gluten-free diet for life."

There is a great variation to gluten sensitivity, she said, and although someone may not have the obvious symptoms, gluten could still cause damage to the intestinal lining.

Frydrych has learned to be vigilant and creative in order to keep Haley healthy, yet not feeling deprived, she said.

"I check companies' websites, and I always, always read labels, even it is a product I've used before. Companies sometimes change their formulas. I often call a company right from the store to check on a product."

When Haley was diagnosed, Frydrych said, they had to order food by mail order or at a speciality store at the Hospital for Sick Children.

"Now gluten-free food is everywhere. And I stock up on Passover products like honey cake, matzah ball mix, and egg noodles made with potato starch. One of Haley's staples is noodles and tomato sauce. The kosher sections of supermarkets have lots of gluten-free food."

In her position in the Celiac Association, she fields calls from members, and she often recommends, even to non-Jewish members, that they check out the kosher food shelves.

She doesn't buy grain-free cookbooks, she said. "I look through my regular cookbooks and I change ingredients. Its a lot of trial and error. Some things I have to throw away, others are delicious.

"I have a recipe for chocolate chip cookies in which I substitute cup for cup, tapioca starch and rice flour for regular flour. I also use one teaspoon of xantham gum – slightly expensive, but necessary for baking – for every cup of flour because that gives it the elasticity found in wheat flour."

Another favourite is chicken fillets dipped in a mixture of egg and honey, coated with seasoned potato starch, and baked.

"I've also dipped chicken or fish in crushed potato chips or instant mashed potato flakes. I fry it lightly to brown it, and then finish it in the oven."

Frydrych can be reached at vicepresident@torontoceliac.org. To join the Canadian Celiac Association, call 1-800-363-7296 or visit either www.torontoceliac.org or www.celiac.ca for more information.

HALEY'S GLUTEN-FREE CHOCOLATE CHIP COOKIES

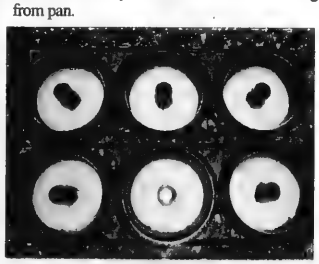
3/4 cup softened butter or pareve shortening cut into small pieces
1 1/4 cups lightly packed brown sugar
1 egg
3 tsp. vanilla
2 tbsp. milk or water
2 cups gluten-free flour (use either 1 1/2 cups tapioca starch or ¶ 1/2 cups potato starch and 1/2 cup rice flour mixed together)
2 tsp. xantham gum
1 tsp. salt
3/4 tsp. baking soda
1 1/2 cups milk chocolate chips or semi-sweet pareve chips
1/2 cup M & Ms, optional (not Smarties as they may contain wheat)

Preheat oven to 375. Cream butter and brown sugar in a large bowl at high speed in a electric mixer for three minutes or until light and fluffy.

Add vanilla, egg and milk until thoroughly mixed. Combine flours, xantham gum, salt and baking soda to creamed mixture, slowly beating on low speed for two minutes or just until blended.

Stir in chocolate chips and M & Ms (do not use if there are nut allergies). Refrigerate for 30 minutes, then using a teaspoon, take heaping spoonfuls of dough and drop gently on cookie sheet lined with parchment paper, about two inches apart. With wet hands, pat down gently to form cookie shape.

Bake at 375 for eight minutes for a soft cookie, and 12 minutes for a crispy cookie. Cookies will harden after they cool. Cool before removing from pan.



Gluten-free bagels.

Joni and Haley

Note: Since gluten-free flour is harder to bake with, you may have to add a little more gluten-free flour if cookies spread too much during baking. Bake one sheet of cookies at a time in case you need to add more flour to the next batch. If the first batch spreads too much, they are still delicious, just not as pretty.

JONI FRYDRYCH'S RECIPE FOR GLUTEN-FREE EGG BREAD, BAGELS AND PIZZA CRUST

1/4 cup warm water
1 cup warm milk
2 tbsp. butter
1 egg beaten
2 1/2 cups tapioca flour
1 cup white rice flour
3 1/2 tsp. xantham gum
1 1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 cup sugar
2 1/4 tsp. bread machine yeast

Add water, milk, butter and beaten egg to bread machine tin and stir with spoon. Add gluten-free flours, xantham gum, sugar and salt to bread machine tin.

Make a small well/hole in centre of flour mixture and fill the well/hole with the bread machine yeast. Set bread machine to bread, and choose your crust setting to your liking. Let bread fully cool before slicing

You can set bread machine to dough instead of bread, and when dough cycle is finished, you can form dough into bun/bagel shape by dividing the dough and rolling like a snake. Then pinch edges together and place on parchment paper, far enough apart to allow room for rolls to rise, or in a lightly greased bagel/bun/donut pan.

To use for pizza crust, line a pizza pan or cookie sheet with parchment paper and spread dough to cover pan. Turn oven to 100, and when it is preheated, turn oven off and place buns or pizza crust, covered with clean dish towel, in oven for 1 hour to allow dough to rise.

Remove from oven and preheat oven to 350. When it is preheated, replace dough in oven and bake for approximately 25 to 30 minutes, depending on size, until golden. (I make 12 bagels or buns from this recipe.) Once pizza crust is slightly golden, take it out of the oven and add gluten-free tomato sauce, cheese and your favourite toppings and return to oven to bake just until cheese is melted.

Elegant but simple menu suggestions

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

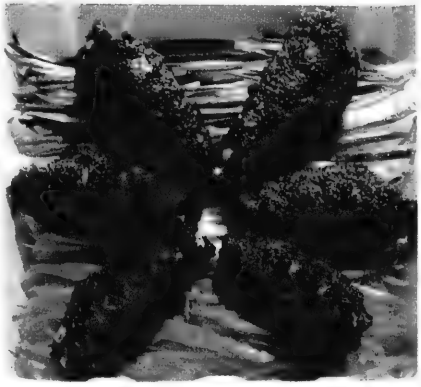
For Rosh Hashanah this year, why not try something new? Instead of an old standby – chicken or brisket (nothing against either mind you!) – knock the socks off your guests with a eye-catching and taste-titillating sliced rib steak.

Nothing could be simpler, since you can marinate it in the spice rub up to 24 hours ahead, then just grill it at the last minute (beef doesn't take well to reheating, so you in fact have to make it at the last minute). The steaks will only take about 15 to 20 minutes to grill, freeing up the oven and stove top for you.

Then just 15 minutes standing time while you're slurping up soup, and they're ready to carve. Be sure to walk around the gathering as you serve the food, strutting its glory and your ingenuity. This will be one Rosh Hashanah dinner, your family and friends won't soon forget.

RIB STEAKS WITH THREE HERB CHIMICHURRI

2 beef rib steaks (each about 1 1/2 lb.)
2 tbsp. dark brown sugar
1 tbsp. sweet smoked or regular paprika
1 tbsp. coarse kosher salt
1 tsp. chili powder
1/2 tsp. ground black pepper



Rib steaks part of elegant meal

Chimichurri sauce
3/4 cup extra virgin olive oil
3 tbsp. Sherry or red wine vinegar
3 tbsp.fresh lemon juice
3 cloves garlic, peeled
1 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
1/4 tsp. red pepper flakes
3 cups stemmed fresh parsley
2 cups stemmed fresh coriander
1 cup stemmed fresh mint

Combine brown sugar, paprika, salt, chili powder and pepper. Coat both sides of steaks well. Cover and refrigerate for at least 8 hours or up to 24 hours.

Make the sauce: in blender or bowl of food processor, combine olive oil, vinegar, lemon juice, garlic, salt, pepper, and red pepper flakes; blend until almost smooth. Gradually add remaining ingredients, pureeing after each addition, until smooth and puréed. Cover and refrigerate for up to 6 hours.

Bring steaks to room temperature for 30 minutes. Place on greased grill over medium high heat. Close and grill, turning once, until medium rare, 15 to 20 minutes. Transfer steaks to cutting board. Tent with foil and let stand for 15 minutes before slicing. Serve with room temperature chimichurri sauce. Makes about 8 servings.

In separate bowl, whisk together orange juice, vinegar, mustard and salt and pepper. Slowly, in thin steady stream, whisk in olive oil until emulsified. Pour dressing over beets until evenly coated. Gently stir in mint. Serve at room temperature. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

ROASTED SMASHED POTATOES

1 1/2 lb. baby red potatoes (about 24)
1 tsp. coarse salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
1/3 cup extra virgin olive oil

Place potatoes in large pot of lightly salted water. Bring to boil, reduce heat and simmer for 30 to 35 minutes or until potatoes are easily pierced with a thin metal or wooden skewer. Drain well on kitchen towels; cool slightly.

Smash each potato with palm of your hand until it flattens to 1/2-in. thickness. Place each smashed potato on aluminum foil-lined baking sheets. (Potatoes can be covered with plastic wrap and refrigerated for up to 8 hours. Bring to room temperature for 30 minutes.)

Sprinkle potatoes with coarse salt and pepper. Drizzle oil evenly over. Roast in centre of preheated 450 oven, turning once, for about 40 minutes or until crispy and golden around the edges. Serve immediately. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

APPLESAUCE CAKE WITH SUGARED DRIED CHERRIES AND CHOCOLATE CHIPS

1/2 cup soy milk
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1/2 cup non-dairy margarine, soft
3/4 cup granulated sugar
2/3 cup packed light brown sugar
2 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
1 cup thick unsweetened applesauce
2 3/4 cups all purpose flour
1 tsp. cinnamon
1 tsp. baking soda
1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
icing sugar

Filling
1 cup dried cherries
2 tbsp. packed brown sugar
1 cup semi-sweet chocolate chips

Make the filling: toss together cherries and sugar in a bowl and set aside for 20 minutes.

Stir together soy milk and lemon juice; let stand for 15 minutes.

Preheat oven to 350. In bowl of electric mixer or using hand-held mixer, cream margarine for 3 minutes. Gradually add granulated and brown sugar, beating until light and fluffy, scraping down sides of bowl as necessary. One at a time, add eggs, beating well after each addition. Beat in vanilla. Using wooden spoon, stir in applesauce – batter will look curdled.

In separate bowl, combine flour, cinnamon, baking soda, baking powder and salt. Making three additions of flour mixture and two of soy milk, alternately add flour and milk to batter, beginning and ending with flour. Fold in cherries and chocolate chips.

Transfer batter to lightly greased 13 x 9-in. baking dish. Bake in centre of preheated oven for 35 to 40 minutes or until top springs back when lightly pressed. Cool on rack for at least 15 minutes. Serve lightly sprinkled with icing sugar. Makes 16 servings.

Sharing some of our favourite holiday recipes

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Holiday time at The Canadian Jewish News is quite hectic, but we're never too busy to talk about menu planning and share recipes with each other.

A number of staff have been generous enough to share some favourite recipes they've served to guests in their sukkah.

AUTUMN VEGETABLE SOUP
Submitted by Leila Speisman

1/4 cup oil
1/2 cup onion, chopped
1 clove garlic, crushed
1 cup mushrooms, sliced
1 eggplant, peeled, cubed
3 tbsp. flour
1 10-oz can clear chicken soup
4 cups water
2 cups zucchini, shredded
1/8 tsp. pepper
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. sugar
1 2 tsp. oregano
1 tbsp. lemon juice

Heat oil in large saucepan. Add onion, garlic, mushrooms and eggplant. Cook over low heat until veggies are tender, around 15 minutes. Stir occasionally.

Sprinkle flour over mixture. Stir in soup, water, zucchini, seasonings and lemon juice. Simmer uncovered 30 minutes, stirring occasionally.

This freezes well, and tastes even better when it has stood for a couple of days in the refrigerator. Serves 6, but recipe can be doubled.

ZUCCHINI COBBLER
Submitted by Michael Stavsky for his wife, Joanna

People will swear this is made with apples! A delicious side dish.

Filling
8 cups peeled chopped zucchini
2/3 cup lemon juice
1 cup sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon
1/2 tsp. nutmeg

Crust
4 cups flour
2 cups sugar
1 1/2 cups cold margarine
1 tsp. cinnamon

In a large saucepan, over medium heat, cook zucchini and lemon juice, stirring, for 15 minutes until tender. Add sugar, cinnamon and nutmeg and simmer 1 minute longer. Remove from heat and set aside.

Combine flour and sugar in a large bowl. Cut in margarine until mixture resembles course crumbs. Stir 1/2 cup of crust mixture into zucchini mixture.

Press half of remaining crust mixture onto a cookie sheet, or preferably, divide between two 9 x 13-in. pans. Spread zucchini mixture over the top. Sprinkle remaining crust mixture over the zucchini. Sprinkle with cinnamon. Bake at 375 for 35-50 minutes, until golden and bubbly.

The recipe can easily be halved. Simply halve all ingredients and use one 9x13-in. pan.

LOWER CARB SHEPHERD'S PIE

Submitted by Ella Burakowski

2 lbs. lean ground beef
1 large head of cauliflower, separated into florets
2 cups frozen peas and corn – or you can use cut green beans instead for even lower carb
2 medium onions, chopped
2 cups mushrooms pieces

CJN staff cooks up a storm

3 large cloves garlic, minced
1 tbsp. olive oil
1-2 tbsp. lower fat margarine
3/4 can low fat pareve mushroom soup
2 tbsp. ketchup
1 tsp. cumin
1 tsp. chili pepper flakes
1/2 tsp. salt (for meat)
1/2 tsp. salt (for cauliflower mixture)
1/2 tsp. pepper
sprinkle of paprika

Preheat oven to 350. Fry onions and garlic in olive oil. Set aside half the mixture for cauliflower and half for meat.

Meanwhile, steam cauliflower till soft, dry, set aside but keep it hot. Fry mushrooms.

Steam frozen veggies until just crisp. Drain well – they should not be wet.

Fry meat and drain any extra fat from cooked meat.

In a bowl, mix the cooked meat, half the onion and garlic mixture, fried mushrooms, peas and corn (or green beans), 1/2 tsp. salt, pepper, cumin, chili pepper flakes, mushroom soup and ketchup. Mix well.

Taste and adjust seasonings as necessary.

Purée cauliflower in food processor until it's the same consistency as mashed potatoes. Mix in the salt, margarine, fried onion and garlic mixture.

Now to put it together – Spray a 3-quart casserole dish with non-stick cooking spray. Spread the meat mixture evenly over the bottom of the dish. Spread the cauliflower mixture evenly on top of the meat. Sprinkle lightly with paprika. Bake for 45 minutes at 350 until top is golden.

ROASTED WINTER-VEGETABLE COMPOSED SALAD

Submitted by Bev Bergman for her daughter Andrea

1/4 cup plus 1 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
2 garlic bulbs, halved horizontally
4 mixed red and golden beets (about 1 lb. total with green), stems trimmed to about 1 inch
5 small onions, cut into wedges
1/2 tsp. coarse salt, divided
1/2 head cauliflower (1 lb.), cut into small clusters
1 bunch carrots, peeled and trimmed (halved lengthwise if large)
2 small winter squash, such as delicata or acorn, cut crosswise into 1/2-inch thick rounds and seeded
2 dried figs (preferably Calimyrna)
3 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
2 tbsp. water
pinch of freshly ground pepper
5 oz. mixed hearty greens, such as baby kale and escarole fresh rosemary sprigs, for garnish

Preheat oven to 425. Using 2 tsp. oil, drizzle cut sides of garlic. Wrap each half in foil. Wrap beets in foil. Roast until garlic is soft and beets are tender, 40 to 50 minutes. Leave oven on.

Toss onions with 2 tsp. oil and 1/4 tsp. salt. Transfer to a rimmed baking sheet. Toss cauliflower with 2 tsp. oil and 1/4 tsp. salt. Transfer to same sheet. Using 1 tbsp. oil, brush or rub carrots and squash. Transfer to a separate rimmed baking sheet.

Roast vegetables, tossing once, until golden brown and tender: 15 to 20 minutes for onions and cauliflower, 20 to 25 minutes for carrots and squash.

Rub beets with paper towels to remove skins; cut flesh into wedges.

To make dressing, purée figs, vinegar, 2 tbsp. water, a pinch of salt and pepper, and remaining 2 tbsp. oil in a blender.

Arrange greens and roasted vegetables on a platter. Garnish with rosemary. Serve either warm or at room temperature with dressing. Serves 6.

Optional: You could include a cup of goat's cheese in the centre of the platter and let people help themselves to a bit with the vegetables, or sprinkle a little bit on everyone's plate.

CABBAGE ROLLS

Submitted by Carolan Halpern

1 lb. ground beef
1/4 cup matzah meal
1/2 cup cooked rice
1 egg
1/4 tsp. salt
cabbage leaves (about 14)
1 onion diced
1/4 cup lemon juice
1/2 cup brown sugar
1 10-oz. can tomato and mushroom sauce or plain tomato sauce
1/2 cup water

Remove leaves from cabbage carefully. Place in large pot. Cover with boiling water. Simmer 5 minutes – drain and cool. Spread out leaves.

Combine meat, matzah meal, rice, egg and salt in a bowl. Place a heaping tbsp. of meat mixture in centre of each cabbage leaf. Fold in sides to cover meat and roll up.

Place rolls in large saucepan open side down, in one layer if possible.

In another bowl, mix together juice, brown sugar, tomato sauce and water. Pour over cabbage rolls. Cover and simmer at least 1-1/2 hours, basting occasionally, and adding a small amount of boiling water if needed to keep cabbage rolls almost covered.

Bundt cake with fall fruits

Break fast with a light meal

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

What do you serve to break the fast? Are you one who has a set menu that you serve every year, or do you try new dishes? Whichever you do, the best approach is to break the fast with light food.

When I lived in North America, our break-the-fast meal was always bagels, cream cheese, lox and scrambled eggs. Since moving to Israel, we take advantage of the wonderful salads, fruits, cheeses and yogurts, and I serve a mixture of Ashkenazi and Sephardi dishes.

Among Ashkenazi Jews the break-the-fast meal is traditionally a dairy one – in North America, bagels with lox and cream cheese are almost mandatory. Other dairy dishes such as cheese blintzes or noodle kugel are also very common, as well as light, not overly sweet cakes like sour cream coffee cake, sponge cake or honey cake. In Sephardi communities, breaking the fast may be done with a dairy meal as well, but it will feature a variety of sweet and savoury pastries and fresh fruit, and it is common for the meal to include some type of fish.

In addition, the first food taken to break the Yom Kippur fast often differs for Jews, depending on their country of origin and their family customs. For Ashkenazi Jews, it might be piece of babka or rugelach and a cup of tea. In Israel, Syrian and Iraqi Jews nibble on Ka'a'him, round, crunchy sesame cookies that look like mini-bagels. Turkish and Greek Jews sip on a sweet drink made with melon seeds.

Either of the cakes below, served with a drink, will be a real treat to break your fast before you sit down to dinner. They're also perfect for Sukkot.

BUNDT CAKE STUFFED WITH FALL FRUITS

3 cups flour
2 cups sugar
1 tbsp. baking powder
1 cup vegetable oil
5 eggs
1 tbsp. vanilla extract
1/4 cup orange juice
1 large peach, seeded and diced (may use canned or frozen)
4 prune plums, seeded and snipped into 1/4-in. pieces
2 cups diced dried apricots
1 cup pitted dates, coarsely chopped
2 tbsp. sugar
2 tsp. cinnamon
1 tsp. cardamom

Preheat oven to 350. Spray a 12-cup Bundt pan with non-stick cooking spray. In mixer bowl, stir together flour, sugar, baking powder, oil, eggs, vanilla extract and orange juice. Mix at medium-low speed for 10 minutes.

In a separate bowl, combine the peach, plums, apricots, dates, sugar, cinnamon and cardamom.

Spoon half the batter into prepared pan. Spread about 3/4 of fruit mixture over. Top with remaining batter and fruit mixture.

Bake in preheated oven for 1-1/4 hours or until a toothpick comes out clean when inserted in centre. Cool on a wire rack. Slice with a serrated knife. Makes 18-20 servings.

This cake freezes well.

Cranberries key to a great cake

CRANBERRY STREUSEL CAKE

Stock up on packages of fresh cranberries while they're at the peak of their season in the fall and freeze them to use all year long.

Add the topping 40 minutes into baking rather than at the beginning, when it would sink too far into the cake, or at the end, when it wouldn't sink in at all.

2 cups all-purpose flour plus more for the pan
1 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. baking soda
1/2 tsp. ground nutmeg
1/4 tsp. table salt
8 tbsp. unsalted butter or margarine at room temperature plus more for the pan
1 1/3 cups sugar
1 tsp. vanilla extract
3 large eggs, at room temperature
1 cup plain, low-fat yogurt or tofu yogurt
2 cups fresh cranberries, chopped

Streusel
1/4 cup packed light brown sugar
2 tbsp. all-purpose flour
1/2 tsp. ground cinnamon
2 tbsp. cold unsalted butter or margarine, cut into 4 pieces
1/4 cup chopped walnuts
1/4 cup fresh cranberries, chopped

Position a rack in the middle of the oven and preheat the oven to 325. Lightly butter and flour a 9-in. square baking pan. In a medium bowl, whisk the flour, baking powder, baking soda, nutmeg and salt until blended. Set aside.

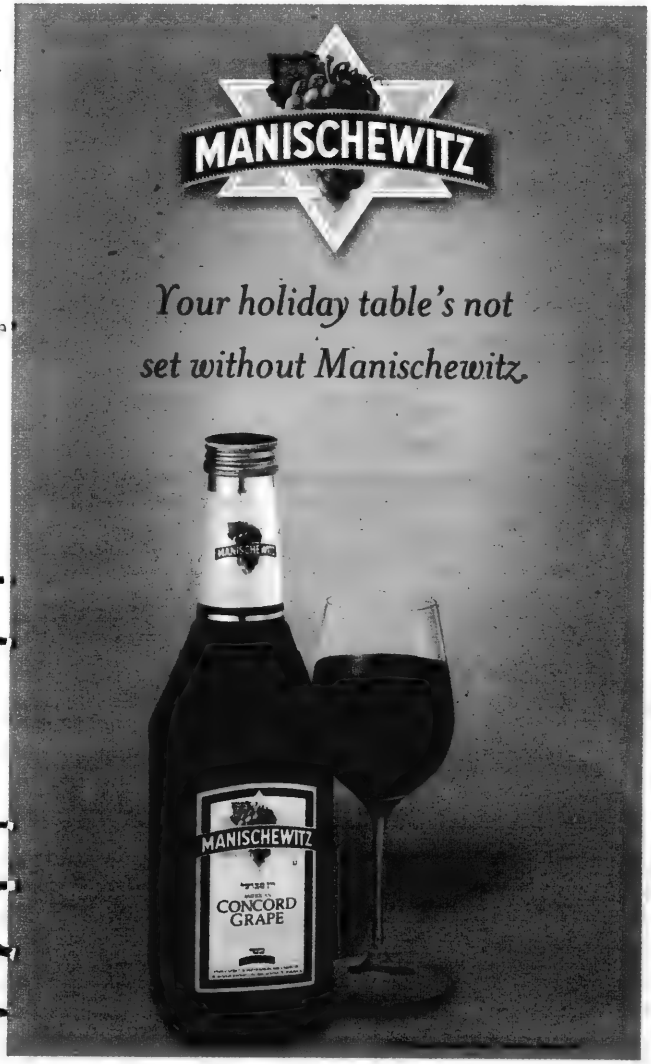
With an electric mixer, beat the butter, sugar and vanilla on medium speed until well blended, about 3 minutes. Reduce the speed to medium low and add the eggs one at a time, mixing until just incorporated.

Using a wide rubber spatula, alternately fold the flour mixture and the yogurt into the butter mixture, beginning and ending with the flour mixture. Add the chopped cranberries with the last addition of flour. Scrape the batter into the prepared pan and spread it evenly. Tap the pan gently on the counter to release any air bubbles. Bake for 40 minutes.

Make the streusel. While the cake is baking, combine the brown sugar, flour, and cinnamon in a medium bowl. Add the butter and mix, using a fork, until the ingredients are well blended and form small crumbs. Stir in the walnuts and cranberries.

After the cake has baked for 40 minutes, sprinkle the streusel evenly over the top of the cake. Continue baking until a pick inserted in the centre comes out clean, another 10 to 15 minutes. Cool in the pan on a wire rack until warm or room temperature. Cut into squares and serve. Makes 9 servings.

Note: This cake tastes best the day after you bake it.



Roasted eggplant sandwich

When you don't want a heavy meat meal…

By DOROTHY LIPOVENKO
Special to The CJN

If you've got a long walk to and from shul on Rosh Hashanah, or you don't get home from services until early afternoon anyway, you might not be in the mood for a meat meal by the time you unlock the front door, kick off your shoes, and finish massaging those aching feet.

It's a good hour each way for me and my husband, and I admit we nibble a little something on the trek back: a few homemade oatmeal cookies to fortify us for the uphill climb, keeping me munching instead of stopping every two seconds to kvetch. And it's cute when birds happily follow the trail of crumbs.

Put together a quick, light holiday lunch

So it makes sense, by 2:30 in the afternoon, to ignore the cold brisket and potatoes from the night before and go with something light but satisfying. Truth be told, my kitchen is mostly vegetarian, so there is no brisket dilemma. We'll likely eat on Rosh Hashanah the same food that has taken star billing for Shabbat lunches in the summer: roasted eggplant sandwiches, which can be put together fast and demolished even faster. With a pareve soup and fruit cobbler for dessert, you'll be able to get off the couch and head out to Tashlich.

A second recipe, a favourite at our house for Shabbat dinners, is equally elegant for guests as a main dish or and appetizer. It's a fragrant pepper quiche that I adapted by giving it a nutritional boost with spinach. This is the best time of year to make it, when local peppers are gorgeous, plentiful and cheap. The quiche should be served hot, which makes it ideal for dinner.

If more veggies and less meat are on your to-do list for the new year, these recipes should help jump-start that initiative. Shanah Tovah.

ROASTED EGGPLANT SANDWICHES

1 medium eggplant.
1/4 cup well-washed, chopped Italian parsley
juice of 1 lemon
1 large clove garlic, sliced thin thin slices of English or Kirby cucumber
1 large rose or red tomato, thickly sliced
4 slices roasted yellow or red pepper small wedges of Edam, Kashkaval or other soft cheese fresh basil leaves
4 4-in. pitas (preferably the kind with olive bits in them), halved hearts of palm spears

Wash eggplant well and discard stem and some of the top. Slice remaining eggplant into about 3/4-in. rounds. Line a rimmed baking sheet with foil, brush with good-quality olive oil. Lay eggplant slices on pan next to each other (not overlapping) and drizzle well with olive oil. Bake at 375 until slices are well-browned and have shrunk somewhat. Watch that they don't burn.

Put lemon juice, parsley and garlic in a container. When eggplant is done, let it cool out of the oven for a few minutes. But while eggplant is still warm, remove slices and place them in the container, tossing gently with a fork to coat eggplant with the lemon juice, garlic and parsley. (Depending on how much juice the lemon yielded you might want to add a little more.) Cover and refrigerate overnight.

For lunch, spread a thin layer of the cheese on half a pita. Then layer one or two slices of eggplant with bits of parsley, a slice of roast pepper, thin slices of cucumber and a thick slice of tomato sprinkled with black pepper. Top with a few basil leaves and remaining pita half. Enjoy with cold hearts of palm. Serves 3 or 4.

For extra protein, serve a lentil soup to which some cooked thin egg noodles have been added.

Lentil soup adds protein to vegetarian lunch

PEPPER QUICHE

1 frozen, unbaked pie shell
3/4 of a 10-oz. bag of fresh spinach
3 tbsp. feta cheese
1 medium onion, chopped
1 medium red and 1 medium orange pepper
2-3 large fresh basil leaves
1 tsp. olive oil
dash or two of garlic powder
3 large eggs
3-4 tbsp. 10 per cent cream
dash or two of black pepper

Prick and partially bake frozen pie shell for a few minutes until lightly browned. Remove from oven and cool.

Sauté onion (I do it on low heat in a few tbsp. of water with a dash of paprika for colour). Set aside.

Cut peppers in half, remove seeds, slice thin and sauté for a few minutes.

Wash spinach well, steam until slightly wilted (use the microwave) and when cool, squeeze out excess liquid. In a blender, pulse the spinach a few seconds with the basil, feta and olive oil, adding a dash or two of garlic powder, until mixture is smooth but still thick.

To assemble: spread spinach mixture on bottom of cooled piecrust. Sprinkle the sauteed onions over spinach, and then scatter the peppers throughout to cover. Beat eggs with the cream (I throw away at least one yolk) and a dash or two of black pepper. Pour this on top of the peppers.

Bake at 350 until egg mixture feels firm and set, about 45 minutes, or a little longer if necessary. Serves 3-4. This quiche tastes best fresh.

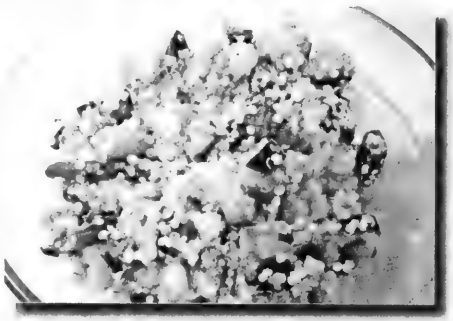
Flavour of quinoa can be varied with stocks

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special The CJN



Cooks looking to serve something a little bit different this holiday season should try quinoa, a grain that is native to South America, and has been cultivated for more than 5,000 years.

You can vary the flavour of quinoa to complement whatever you're cooking by adding your favourite sautéed vegetables, or by cooking the quinoa in chicken, fish or vegetable stock instead of water.

It can be used in salads and sides, as well as desserts (yes, desserts), and cooks in just 15 minutes.

BASIC QUINOA

2 cups water
1 cup quinoa

Rinse quinoa thoroughly, either by using a strainer or by running fresh water over the quinoa in a pot. Drain excess water. Place quinoa and water in a 1-1/2 quart sauce pan and bring to a boil. Reduce to a simmer, cover, and cook until all of the water is absorbed (about 15 minutes). You will know that the quinoa is done when all the grains have turned from white to transparent and the spiral-like germ has separated. Makes 3 cups.

SWEET QUINOA SALAD

1 cup water
1 cup apple juice
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1 cup quinoa, well rinsed and drained
2 large red apples, diced
1 cup chopped celery
1/2 cup dried cranberries or dried cherries
1/2 cup chopped walnuts or pecans
1 cup non-fat vanilla yogurt or mayonnaise

Place water, apple juice, cinnamon and rinsed quinoa in a saucepan and bring to a boil over high heat. Reduce heat, cover and simmer until all of the liquid is absorbed, approximately 15 minutes. Cool, transfer quinoa to a large mixing bowl and refrigerate, covered, at least 1 hour. Add apples, celery, dried cranberries and walnuts or pecans to quinoa. Mix well. Fold in yogurt or mayonnaise. Serve immediately. Serves 8.

QUINOA PILAF

1/2 cup carrot, diced
6 cups quinoa, cooked (see Basic Quinoa recipe)
1/2 cup green onion, diced
1/4 cup olive oil
1/2 cup celery, diced
2 tsp. garlic, minced
1 cup sliced almonds, toasted
1/2 cup sweet red pepper, diced
1/2 tsp. oregano
salt to taste

Cook the quinoa according to the directions. While the quinoa is cooking, sauté the chopped vegetables in the olive oil until clear, yet crisp: stir in oregano. Add the sautéed vegetables to cooked, hot quinoa, mixing well. Add salt to taste. Add the toasted almonds and mix to combine and serve. Serves 6-8.

QUINOA AND GRILLED-PEPPER SALAD

3 cups quinoa, cooked and cooled
3 yellow and 2 red sweet bell peppers, quartered
2 zucchini cut into long strips
1 red onion, cut into thick rings
2 tsp. olive oil
1 tsp. fresh lime juice
1 tsp. soy sauce
1/2 tsp. ground cumin
1/4 cup chopped fresh cilantro
2 green onions, chopped
1/2 cup pine nuts, toasted

While quinoa is cooking, grill the zucchini and bell peppers on a well-oiled rack set 5 to 6 inches over glowing coals until slightly softened, about 4 minutes on each side. If you prefer, grill the vegetables in a well-oiled ridged grill pan. Cut bell peppers and zucchini crosswise into thin strips. Cut the onion rings into quarters. In a small bowl, whisk together oil, lime juice, soy sauce, and cumin. Place the quinoa in a large bowl, stir in the bell peppers, zucchini, red onions, cilantro, green onions, and salt and pepper to taste. Combine the two mixtures. Decorate the top with pine nuts. If making ahead of time, don't add the pine nuts until just ready to serve. Serve at room temperature. Serves 6 to 8.

QUINOA WITH FRIED ONIONS

1/2 cup quinoa
1 cup water
2 medium onions
2 tbsp. olive oil
2 tbsp. chopped parsley
1/4 cup (1 oz.) grated Parmesan cheese ground black pepper

Rinse the quinoa under cold running water until the water turns clear. In a 2-quart saucepan, combine the quinoa and water. Simmer over medium-low heat for about 15 minutes, or until the quinoa begins to soften. Remove from the heat and drain. Meanwhile, peel the onions and cut into 1/8- to 1/4-inch slices. Warm the oil in a large skillet over medium-low heat. Add the onions and cook for about 10 minutes, or until they soften and brown. Add water, 1 tablespoon at a time, as necessary to prevent burning. In a medium bowl, combine the quinoa, onions, parsley, cheese and pepper to taste. Toss well. Serve as a side dish.

Sugar and spice and everything nice

Preheat oven to 325. Spray a Bundt pan with non-stick spray. In a bowl, combine the flour, soda, cinnamon, nutmeg and salt and set aside. In another bowl combine the applesauce, oil and vanilla and set aside. In the bowl of an electric mixer, place the eggs and beat at medium speed until foamy.

Gradually add the sugar, beating well. Add the flour mixture and applesauce mixture alternately to egg mixture, beginning and ending with flour mixture; beat well after each addition. Fold in the raisins and pie filling by hand.

Spoon the cake batter into a 10-in. tube pan coated with cooking spray. Bake for 1 hour and 15 minutes or until a wooden pick inserted in centre comes out clean. Cool in pan 10 minutes on a wire rack and remove from pan. Cool completely on a wire rack. Drizzle syrup over top of cooled cake. Serves 10 to 12.

APPLE BUTTER CAKE

2 1/4 cups flour
1 1/2 cups apple butter
1 1 4 cups sugar
2 3 cup shortening
1/3 cup milk or non dairy substitute
2 eggs
2 tsp. baking soda
2 tsp. cinnamon
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. nutmeg
1/2 tsp. ground cloves
1 cup dark seedless raisins
1/2 cup walnuts, chopped

Preheat oven to 350. Grease and flour a 13x9-inch baking pan. Combine all the ingredients except the raisins and nuts in a small bowl. With mixer at low speed, beat until well-mixed, constantly scraping bowl with spatula. Beat at high speed for 3 minutes, occasionally scraping bowl. Stir in raisins and nuts. Pour batter into pan. Bake for 40 to 45 minutes. Check for doneness by inserting toothpick in centre until toothpick comes out clean. Cool cake in pan or on wire rack. Serves 10.

Note: You may want to adjust spices depending on how spicy the apple butter is. You can also bake this in 2 loaf pans.

BROWN SUGAR APPLE CAKE

1 cup sugar
1 cup brown sugar
2 cups flour
4 eggs
3 tsp. baking powder
1/2 cup oil
3 tsp. vanilla
1/3 cup orange juice
1/4 tsp. salt

Apple Mixture
4 large apples, peeled, cored and sliced
4 tsp. brown sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. In a bowl, combine the sugar, brown sugar, flour, eggs, baking powder, oil, vanilla, orange juice and salt. Beat with mixer for 7 to 8 minutes. Grease 2 loaf pans or 1 Bundt pan and make several layers of batter and apples, beginning with batter and ending with apples. Bake for 1 hour or until tester is dry when inserted in centre. A Bundt pan will take 10-15 minutes longer. Serves 10 to12.

FRESH APPLE CAKE

3 cups flour
1 tsp. baking soda
1/4 tsp. salt
1 tsp. cinnamon
3 eggs
2 cups sugar
1 1/2 cups oil
3 cups chopped apples, such as Rome Beauty or Granny Smith
1 cup chopped walnuts
2 tsp. vanilla
brown sugar topping (recipe below)

Preheat oven to 350. Sift together the flour, baking soda, salt and cinnamon; set aside. Beat eggs, add sugar and oil and beat for 3 minutes. Gradually stir in sifted dry ingredients. Fold in apples, walnuts and vanilla. Pour batter into a greased and floured 10-inch tube pan and bake at 350 for 1 hour and 15 minutes. Pour topping over the cake as soon as it comes out of the oven. Let cool, loosen sides, invert on a plate, then invert on another plate, topping side up. Serves 8 to 10.

Topping
1 cup light brown sugar, firmly packed
1/4 cup milk or non dairy substitute
1/2 cup (1 stick) butter or margarine

In a saucepan combine the brown sugar, milk and butter in a saucepan. Bring to a full boil and boil for 3 minutes. Pour the hot mixture over the cake right out of the oven. Serves 8 to 10.

APPLE RAISIN BREAD

3 cups apples, peeled and chopped
1/2 cup of water
1 cup brown sugar, packed, divided
2 cups sifted flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. cinnamon
1/2 tsp. allspice
1 cup oatmeal
1/2 cup raisins
1/2 cup chopped pecans
2 eggs, beaten
1/4 cup melted shortening or oil

Preheat oven to 350. In a saucepan, combine the chopped apples, water and 1/2 cup of the brown sugar. Cook for about 5 minutes or until the apples are almost tender and then cool. In a mixing bowl, combine the flour, baking powder, baking soda, salt, cinnamon, allspice, oatmeal, raisins and pecans. Stir in the cooled apple mixture, eggs, remaining brown sugar and oil. Mix together until just moistened. Bake in a 10-in. Bundt pan for about 40 minutes. Cool for 10 minutes before removing for the pan. Serve the bread warm or cold. The bread may be lightly frosted with a mixture of 1 cup powdered sugar and 2 or 3 tsp. of warm water.

Olmert voices sorrow for plight of Palestinian, Jewish refugees

By SHAHAR ILAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Monday that he feels sorry for Palestinians and Jews who became refugees as a result of Israel's establishment.

"I join in expressing sorrow for what happened to the Palestinians and also for what happened to the Jews who were expelled from Arab states," the prime minister said.

Olmert made the comments before a meeting of the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee, apparently in his last such session as prime minister.

He was speaking in reference to the key Palestinian demand for a "right of return" in peace negotiations with Israel.

"Under absolutely no circumstances will there be a right of return," Olmert declared. "But we are prepared to be part of an international mechanism that will work to solve the problem."

Palestinians have demanded that Israel accept responsibility for the suffering of Palestinians who fled or were driven from their homes in the War of Independence that followed Israel's 1948 creation.

Olmert's remarks Monday fell far short of meeting this demand. But it was unusual for an Israeli prime minister to express sorrow for what happened to the Palestinians.

The prime minister also said that a peace deal with the Palestinian Authority will involve proportionate land swaps between the two sides.

"The territorial price of peace with the Palestinians will bring us very close to the land-for-land formula. This needs to be said forthrightly and with courage. There are different ways of reaching this formula through annexing or exchanging territories," Olmert said.

Muslim leader threatens Paul McCartney

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — An Islamic militant leader warned that former Beatle Paul McCartney could be the target of suicide bombers unless he cancels his first concert in Israel, reported the British Sunday Express.

The celebrated rock star plans to arrive in Israel as part of a world tour, and give a single concert at Tel Aviv's Park Hayarkon on Sept. 25.

Omar Bakri, an Islamic preacher, formerly in London and now in Lebanon, said McCartney's decision to perform as part of Israel's 60th anniversary celebrations made him the enemy of Muslims worldwide.

"If he values his life, Mr. McCartney must not come to Israel," Bakri was quoted as saying. "He will not be safe there. The sacrifice operatives will be waiting for him."

Bakri added, "Instead of supporting the people of Palestine in their suffering, McCartney is celebrating the atrocities of the occupiers," Bakri was quoted as saying. "The one who is under occupation is supposed to be getting the help."

McCartney was also been pressured by pro-Palestinian groups to cancel the show, but has resisted.

"I was approached by different groups and political bodies who asked me not to come here. I refused. I do what I think, and I have many friends who support Israel," McCartney said in an interview with Yediot Achronot.

Pro-Palestinian groups have frequently called on international academics and prominent cultural figures to boycott Israel over its occupation of the West Bank and blockade of the Hamas-controlled Gaza Strip.

Moscow-Tehran ties don't harm Israel, Russia says

By ADAR PRIMOR
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said on Friday that ties between Russia and Iran don't pose a threat to Israel, and that Russian decisions with Tehran's leadership are not directed at the Jewish state.

Lavrov's remarks came in response to a question from a Ha'aretz reporter, who asked whether Moscow plans to "play the Iran card" and torpedo western efforts to impose sanctions on Tehran in an effort to prevent the Islamic republic from developing nuclear weapons.

Lavrov didn't answer the question directly, but did say that Russia's decisions on the issue of Iran are not meant to harm Israel. "We have good historic ties with the Iranians. We send them weapons, but only for defensive purposes – no weapons that would cause regional instability," he said.

Speaking at the Valdai Discussion Club, an annual forum of opinion-makers that brings world leaders to Russia to discuss global diplomatic issues and this year focused on Russia's international role, Lavrov added that Russia's stance has not changed and Iran needs to abide by the guidelines set forth by the UN nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency. He said Russia is getting positive signals on Iran's compliance with those guidelines.

Russian representatives have recently been invited to participate in another round of talks on Iran's disputed nuclear program, Lavrov said, as part of the group of six major powers – the five permanent UN Security Council members, Russia, China, United States, Britain and France, as well as Germany.

Russia is known to support the idea that Iran should not be punished over its nuclear program, and it was clear from Lavrov's remarks that Russia intends to continue supporting the moderate economic sanctions currently in place against Iran.

Russian President Dmitry Medvedev, who also spoke at the Valdai forum Friday, expressed the same idea: "We know that certain players are planning an attack against Iran. But we oppose any unilateral step and military solution to the nuclear crisis.

"The world does not need to tighten its sanctions on Iran at this time," he added.

Medvedev also said, however, that "when Russia proposes a meditation service, its sole intention is to assist in bringing about a peace that both Jews and Arabs will enjoy."

In regard to the co-operation between Israel and Russia's neighbour, Georgia, Lavrov said the Israeli government froze its weapons shipments to the region two weeks before Georgia attempted to retake the rebel region of South Ossetia, a move that sparked a Russian invasion into Georgia. He said this suggested that Israel knew in advance about the attack. However, he also expressed his satisfaction with Israel's response, saying he hoped Israel would not resume the arming of Georgia.

"We saw what the Israeli weapons were ultimately used for," he said, a comment that was viewed by some as a veiled threat aimed at Jerusalem.

In related news, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vowed Friday to keep supporting the Palestinian militant group Hamas until the "collapse of Israel."

The Iranian news agency Khabar quoted Ahmadinejad as telling Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh that Iran views the support of the Palestinian people as part of its religious and national duty and that Iran will stand behind the Palestinian nation "until the big victory feast, which is the collapse of the Zionist regime."

In a phone conversation with Haniyeh, the Iranian president said the continued Hamas resistance against Israel and the group's achievements would always be "a source of pride for all Muslims."

Iran does not acknowledge the sovereignty of Israel and vowed to support Hamas until what Ahmadinejad calls "deliverance from Zionists (Israel)."

Haniyeh, the leader of the Islamist Hamas movement in the Gaza Strip, was elected Palestinian prime minister in 2006 but was dismissed in June 2007 by Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas after Hamas violently seized control over the Gaza Strip from Abbas' Palestinian Authority.

Earlier last week, Iran's former nuclear negotiator, Hasan Rowhani, harshly rebuked Ahmadinejad, saying the hardline president's policies have done more harm than good in his three years in office. Rowhani said the Iranian leader missed out on "golden" opportunities to develop the Persian state. His remarks were the latest criticism in a growing tide of opposition Ahmadinejad faces at home ahead of the 2009 presidential elections.

Speaking to a meeting of the Moderation and Development party, the former negotiator pointed out that Iran's inflation is high despite the country's huge oil revenues. He said Ahmadinejad failed to privatize the economy as required under the constitution and didn't use opportunities at the international level to improve Iran's standing.

"All this is very harmful to Iran," Rowhani said. "Why are people's pockets empty and their dignity on sale?" he asked in his speech. "Careless, uncalculated and unstudied remarks and slogans have imposed many costs on the nation and the country."

Ahmadinejad has pursued a hard-line foreign policy, calling for Israel to be "wiped off the map" and describing the Holocaust as a "myth," comments that have brought international condemnation of Iran.

He has also dismissed as "worthless papers" the UN Security Council resolutions imposing sanctions against Iran for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment.

Elected in 2005 on a populist agenda that promised to bring oil revenues to every family, eradicate poverty and tackle unemployment, Ahmadinejad is now seen as having failed to fulfil those pledges.

He is being challenged not only by reformers but by the same conservatives who paved the way for his election victory and now say he has concentrated too much on fiery, anti-U.S. and anti-Israel rhetoric, and not enough on the economy. Still, Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei has given unprecedented public support to Ahmadinejad, urging him last month to pursue a second term in elections next year.

Rowhani said Ahmadinejad's government was selling crude oil at $120 (all figures US) a barrel while the budget had anticipated only $20 a barrel. Paradoxically, Iranians are poorer, the economy is in tatters and the country has steered away from its goal of a better life for Iranians.

Rowhani is known as a pragmatist and an ally of former president Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, a rival of Ahmadinejad.

Three Jewish teens attacked

JTA

PARIS — The father of one of the three Jewish teenagers beaten in Paris said at least 10 assailants of mixed ethnic origin were involved.

Thierry Nabet, whose 17-year-old son, Dan, was one of the Bnei Akiva youth counsellors beaten recently, also confirmed that brass knuckles were used in the attack.

No updates have been made public on the police search for suspects, though the victims told investigators that they recognized their attackers from their own neighbourhood. The attack drew national attention because it occurred on the same Paris street where another Jewish teen was assaulted in June.

Nabet's father said the incident involving his son began with a stone thrown at the three boys, aged 17 and 18, as they headed to one of their homes between Sabbath prayer services.

Top French officials branded the Sept. 6 attack as anti-Semitic.

The victims, who were wearing kippot, were temporarily hospitalized for minor injuries.

Badly bruised and with a few fractures, the three boys are shocked, and worried about their safety, said the president of the French Jewish Student Union UEJF, Raphael Haddad, who spoke to the victims.

"Their attackers were also from the neighbourhood," said Haddad in a telephone interview with JTA, "so they are worried about what will happen if they see them again after today."

The three boys reported the incident to Paris police after going to the hospital. The attack took place in the low-income, heavily Jewish and Muslim northeastern Paris neighbourhood, where 17-year-old Rudy Haddad was beaten on June 21 by a group of young people. Haddad ended up in a coma after the beating. City investigators say the attack involved an anti-Semitic impulse.

Two of Haddad's assailants were charged with "attempted murder and group violence aggravated by their anti-Semitic character."

In a news release, Interior Minister Michèle Alliot-Marie said she condemned the "anti-Semitic violent acts" that took place on Sept. 6.

Richard Prasquier, the president of the Jewish umbrella organization CRIF, told the Jewish Radio RCJ that he was "certain" the three boys were targeted because they were identified as Jews.

"There isn't a shadow of a doubt," concerning the "anti-Semitic character" of the crime, said Prasquier. "Let it be made clear – the boys who were walking by had a kippah."

A Paris police spokesperson said an investigation has been launched to determine whether the incident was anti-Semitic, adding that the attackers reportedly did not speak to their victims.

The victims' names were not made public by the French press, but the Jerusalem Post identified them as Bnei Akiva youth group counsellors Kevin Bitan and David Buaziz, both 18, and Dan Nebet, 17.

The Bureau of Vigilance Against Anti-Semitism confirmed their ages and first names.

UN rights chief rejects calls to boycott Durban II

JTA

GENEVA — The new UN human rights chief slammed countries that are threatening to skip a UN conference over unfair criticism of Israel.

In her first address to the UN Human Rights Council, the new UN high commissioner for human rights, Navanethem Pillay, praised the world body's preparations for a follow-up to the 2001 Durban conference on racism and criticized those threatening to walk out of the conference. Several countries have announced they might skip the conference if it unfairly singles out Israel for opprobrium, as the 2001 conference in Durban did.

Pillay, a South African of Tamil descent, rejected that approach.

"I do not believe that 'all or nothing' is the right approach to affirm one's principles or to win an argument," Pillay said. "Should differences be allowed to become pretexts for inaction, the hopes and aspirations of the many victims of intolerance would be dashed irreparably. For these reasons, I urge those governments that have expressed an intention not to participate to reconsider their position."

Among the countries that may skip the conference are Canada, the United States and Israel. France, Britain and the Netherlands also have expressed reservations.

Meanwhile, in a letter to the UN undersecretary general for communications and public information, Kiyo Akasaka, the Simon Wiesenthal Center protested a recent workshop co-sponsored by an anti-Semitic NGO that was active at the 2001 Durban UN World Conference Against Racism.

The workshop, "Human Rights and Armed Conflict: Principles and Practices," was co-sponsored by the Arab Lawyers Union of Egypt and took place at a UN human rights conference at UNESCO headquarters in Paris.

The Arab Lawyers Union of Egypt "in Durban in 2001, distributed a booklet of violently anti-Semitic cartoons and has, since then, continued its incitement to Jew-hatred," said the Wiesenthal Center's director for international relations, Shimon Samuels.

In related UN developments, a UN report reiterated a call for Israel to compensate Lebanon for damage from the 2006 war.

The report published last week by the office of United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon, called "Oil Slick on Lebanese Shores," commended Lebanon for its cleanup efforts along the Mediterranean coastline and urged Israel to help pay for them.

"The secretary general wishes to urge the government of Israel to take the necessary actions towards assuming responsibility for prompt and adequate compensation to the government of Lebanon," the report says, according to UN spokesperson Farhan Haq.

The report cites World Bank data that estimated the environmental toll from the 2006 war at a minimum of $526.9 million (US) and a maximum of $931.1 million.

This is not the first time the UN Secretariat has called on Israel to help pay for the war's environmental costs.

The latest report will be made available to the UN General Assembly when it convenes in New York later this month.

Abbas insists on right of return for Palestinians

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas doubts that any peace agreement can be reached by the end of 2008, as not one of the six key issues in a final-status arrangement has yet been resolved, but insists that any future deal will have to include the right of return for Palestinian refugees.

Speaking to Ha'aretz on the 15th anniversary of the signing of the Oslo accords, Abbas said that Washington plays a central role in the peace process. Senior American officials are anxious to reach an agreement by the end of the year and are convinced this is possible.

However, the gaps between the parties remain wide.

"We presented our ideas and demands regarding the six issues," Abbas stated, "but have not received any answer from the Israeli side."

Among other things, the Palestinians are demanding negotiations over disputed lands claimed by both sides, such as the Latrun region, as part of their demand for an Israeli withdrawal from the entire West Bank, the Gaza Strip and east Jerusalem, subject to territorial swaps.

Regarding the refugees, the Palestinian president said: "We understand that if all five million refugees return to their homes, the State of Israel will be destroyed." Nonetheless, he added, Israel must discuss both its responsibility for the refugee problem and a practical right of return.

From his remarks, it was apparent that he was trying to bring across the message that he is probably the best negotiations partner Israel can currently hope for. On one issue, however, he was adamant: the right of return. In any future peace deal, Israel will have to commit to absorbing Palestinian refugees, following negotiations over the numbers, he insisted.

"Palestinians who do not return to Israel will be able to return to Palestine," he continued. He also said a solution to the refugee problem would be based on the Arab peace initiative of 2002, which stated that the solution must be based on United Nations Resolution 194, but acceptable to Israel.

Mahmoud Abbas

Abbas pointed out that every Muslim nation in the region, including Iran (before Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's election as president), adopted the Arab initiative. "I presented the document with the Iranian signature to [Israeli Prime Minister Ehud] Olmert, but he did not respond," Abbas said. "Regrettably, to this day no debate has been held by the Israeli cabinet."

Abbas stressed that he will not agree to an interim arrangement such as a state in temporary borders. Any agreement must address all the components of the conflict, including Jerusalem and the right of return, he said, therefore, "nothing is agreed until everything is agreed."

He concurred with Jordan's King Abdullah II, who told the French newspaper L'Express that he doubts Israel wants to resolve the conflict, as it lacks long-term vision. The outlines of an agreement are well-known, he said, and Israel's internal political disputes are apparently the reason no progress has been made.

Under an Arab League proposal to reconcile Fatah and Hamas, Abbas said, all members of the Fatah-Hamas unity government would have to honour all agreements and commitments signed by the Palestine Liberation Organization, including the Arab initiative and the "road map" peace plan. He urged Israel to release all the Hamas parliamentarians it has jailed, saying: "We have made it clear to Israel that any peace agreement would involve the release of all Palestinian prisoners."

He also warned against the increasing strength of Al Qaeda in the territories and said the way to curb the organization's power is to end the blockade of Gaza, since suffering strengthens the extremists.

"Even today, I am sure I would sign the Oslo accords," Abbas concluded. "I risked my life for peace, and if I have to pay for it with my life, it is still a marginal price."

He rejected calls from some leading Palestinians for a single state in which Palestinians would have equal rights. "We must stick to the 'two states for two peoples' solution. But the continued construction of settlements, the roadblocks, the raids in the West Bank distance it."

He emphasized that the West Bank and Gaza must be united, or there will be no Palestinian state. Nonetheless, he insisted that this must be achieved only through diplomatic means. "We erred when we made the second intifadah into an armed struggle, and I will do everything to prevent a third armed intifadah," he said.

Austrian court unfreezes terrorist's bank account

By YOSSI MELMAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

VIENNA — Austria's justice ministry, security services and Jewish community are furious over a Vienna Court decision to unfreeze a bank account of the Palestinian Abu Nidal terrorist group.

At the end of the 1990s, Bank Austria froze the $10-million account of Iraqi citizen Halima al-Mughrabi, on the order of Austria's intelligence services, as part of the international campaign to intensify the sanctions on Saddam Hussein's regime.

On Jan. 13, 2000, al-Mughrabi went to her bank branch in Vienna and asked to transfer some $2 million from her account to her account in the Arab Bank in Jordan. The bank clerks held her up and called the police. She was charged with being active in the Abu Nidal organization (ANO) and managing its bank account. She was also said to be the wife of ANO's treasurer.

The judge remanded her to custody, but some time later her attorney convinced the court to release her on a $40,000 bail. The attorney, Farid Rifat, promised that al-Mughrabi would attend her trial and the court consented to return her passport to her. Al-Mugrabi fled from Austria. Rifat said she lives in Libya, and since her passport had been confiscated by the Libyan authorities she could not attend the trial.

From Libya, al-Mughrabi demanded that Bank Austria unfreeze her account and release the money. Jewish organizations and families of victims killed by ANO terrorists asked the court to have the money used to compensate terror victims. The Palestine Liberation Organization also approached Austria unofficially, claiming that the money belonged to it.

Austrian secret service officials, a former German intelligence service (BND) agent and author-journalist Willi Dittel testified at the trial about the nature of the ANO. From their testimonies and a story published recently by journalist Florian Klenk in the Austrian weekly Falter, it emerged that al-Mughrabi, whom the Austrian media dubbed "the soft lady," claimed that she was a housewife married to a successful cattle and poultry farmer.

Austrian intelligence officials disputed her version and said her husband, Mustafa Najim, was ANO's treasurer and managed eastern European companies for the organization.

Dittel testified that Najim's company in the former East Berlin was sponsored by the Stasi, East Germany's notorious secret police. He said Najim had purchased in Britain 170 riot control guns, among other things, ostensibly intended for Yemen, and gave 70 of them to Stasi. In Poland, Najim's company dealt in real estate, and he deposited the profits in his wife's account in Bank Austria.

Swiss prosecutor Carla del Ponte said Najim was in regular contact with Abu Nidal himself and transferred $5 million to Abu Nidal's wife and daughter's bank accounts during the 1980s.

The court, however, was not convinced by the prosecution's evidence and arguments that the money belonged to a terror organization, and decided to unfreeze the account, stating that the ANO no longer existed, therefore there was no risk that the money would be used for terror.

The Austrian prosecution, surprised by the court's decision, appealed immediately to Austria's Supreme Court, whose decision is pending.

Abu Nidal, "father of the struggle" in Arabic, is the alias of Sabri al-Bana, who was born in 1937 in Jaffa to a wealthy family in British-ruled Palestine. The family fled during the War of Independence to the West Bank. In the 1950s, he joined the Arab nationalist Baath Party, and in 1967 he joined Fatah and assumed the underground alias of Abu Nidal. He trained in North Korea and China, and represented the Fatah and PLO in Iraq. At the beginning of the 1970s, he denounced former PLO leader Yasser Arafat as a traitor to the Palestinian revolution, when the latter proposed creating a national authority in the West Bank and Gaza Strip as a step toward Palestinian statehood. He formed an independent faction, the Fatah Revolutionary Council, and continued advocating Israel's destruction.

In the next 30 years, Abu Nidal assassinated Fatah and PLO representatives (including murdering Isam Sirtawi, who reportedly gave up terrorism, and attempting to murder now-Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas), then became a "hired gun," putting his organization at Hussein's service against Syria, and at Syria's service against Jordanian targets. His men served as mercenaries for Moammar Gadhafi's Libya. In between, he extorted money from Gulf emirates and Saudi Arabia after hitting their embassies and airlines. He also attacked Israeli and Jewish targets in Europe.

In the 1980s, Abu Nidal was seen as the world's most dangerous terrorist. At that time he began developing signs of paranoia and imposed a terror regime on his own members. In the 1990s, he ordered a massacre in his activists' camp in Libya, and hundreds of his men were butchered. From that moment, ANO's decline began. Abu Nidal was sentenced to death in absentia by the PLO in 1974 for attacks on fellow Palestinians, and again in 2001 by Jordan for the 1994 assassination of a Jordanian diplomat in Beirut.

Abu Nidal returned to Iraq, and in August 2001, Hussein's government reported that he had committed suicide when policemen came to arrest him on suspicion of conspiracy, sponsored by Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, against Hussein.

During the 1980s, Austria was one of ANO's preferred targets. Abu Nidal's men killed Vienna city councillor and chairman of the Austria-Israel Friendship Society Heinz Nittel, and three months later murdered two and injured 30 in a Vienna synagogue. His organization is believed to be behind a December 1985 attack on El Al desks in Vienna and Rome airports, in which 18 people were killed and dozens injured.

The Abu Nidal group has been on the U.S. list of terrorist organizations for more than 20 years, but is currently thought to be inactive, according to the 2006 State Department Country Reports on Terrorism. In August 2002, Abu Nidal was reported dead in Iraq.

Nasrallah makes threats

Hezbollah's leader said his guerrilla organization would respond if Israel attacked Gaza or its Arab neighbors. "Any Israeli attack against Lebanon, Iran, Syria or the Gaza Strip will be answered with a harsh response," Hassan Nasrallah told Iran Broadcasting via a video link from a secure hiding place. "Our situation is stronger than it has ever been – from the logistical point of view, militarily and in numbers. Lebanon as a whole is united against one enemy: Israel." Nasrallah said that as long as Israel exists, there will never be Mideast peace. He blamed the region's lack of stability on the "aggressiveness and the natural militancy of Israel." Nasrallah has been in hiding since Israel's 2006 war with Lebanon.

Fatal crash grounds Cobras

The Israeli Air Force grounded its fleet of Cobra helicopters in the wake of a crash that killed two crewmen. A Cobra helicopter crashed 10 minutes after takeoff last week for a routine training flight in northern Israel. The Cobras have been grounded pending an investigation into the crash. Witnesses said a propeller appeared to have detached from the helicopter, causing it to crash to the ground near Kibbutz Ginegar in the Jezreel Valley and burst into a ball of flames, igniting the ammunition it was carrying. Rescue teams were unable to approach the crash site for a long time. Both crewmen died, including a 35-year-old reservist with five children. The U.S.-made helicopter and another were flying in formation before the crash. It's unknown if the two aircraft touched.

Helping particles collide

A team of Israeli scientists played a major role in the successful test of the world's largest particle collider. Scientists present for the first major test of the $3.8 billion Large Hadron Collider, located at the European Organization for Nuclear Research in Geneva, called it a success. Some 40 Israeli scientists from the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology, Tel Aviv University and Haifa University worked for 10 years to develop parts of the collider's main electronic systems. "The Israeli science industry has a stellar reputation in Switzerland, especially when it comes to high-level, fibre-optic technology," Prof. Giora Mikenberg of the department of particle physics at the Weizmann Institute, who heads the Israeli team, told Ynetnews. The Israeli scientists co-operated with Lebanese, Palestinian, Pakistani and Iranian scientists. The machine, which includes a 17-mile underground ring, creates high-energy collisions of protons at close to the speed of light. Scientists hope it will answer many questions in modern physics and re-create the conditions of the origins of the universe, particularly the Big Bang.

Comedian's dark humour encompasses brain tumours, chemo

By SHLOMIT KRIGER
Special to The CJN

Watching Jon Steinberg perform is sure to spark many laughs and leave some mouths gaping.

Apart from the 28-year-old Toronto standup comedian's wild curly hair and unique intonation, he's best known for telling jokes that are blunt and even somewhat controversial. Whether they're about banning guns, chemotherapy or pedophiles, he does not hold back with his creative and dark humour.

"I find that's where the good comedy is," he said while playing with his curls during a recent interview at a local Starbucks.

"The subjects people don't spend much time thinking about would likely bring up an original joke, like about homelessness as opposed to airline food.

"I also found this to be a way of coping with things that scare you. For example, when I talk about having had a brain tumour as a child. When you make a joke about something, you step back from it, look at it more objectively, and it doesn't seem as overwhelming."

Steinberg has always enjoyed making people laugh. He often told jokes and stories at parties in high school.

"I knew I wanted to become a professional comedian," he said between sips of his hot chocolate, "but I never really thought I could."

He did his first show at Yuk Yuk's in Ottawa at age 19, which he said is a typical age for comedians to start out. He was happy to see that apart from his friends, the audience responded well, and the club owner was supportive and encouraged him to keep doing comedy.

Steinberg's following at comedy clubs grew fairly quickly. He celebrated his 100th show on his 22nd birthday.

Feeling that "Toronto is the place to be for comedy in Canada," he made the move from his hometown in Ottawa to the city in 2003.

He took the comedy program at Humber College for a while, but didn't complete it. He ended up signing a contract with Yuk Yuk's that year.

In a good month, Steinberg will do 20 to 25 shows. He has performed across Canada and also appeared on the television station the Comedy Network and a radio station on XM Satellite Radio.

Garnering additional recognition, he has also been nominated for several awards, including a Canadian Comedy Award (the awards are presented by the Canadian Comedy Foundation for Excellence and Higher Ground Productions) for best new comic.

No one else in Steinberg's family is in the comedy business, although his father sometimes gets mistaken for comedian David Steinberg, since they share the same name.

Jon's parents were originally bent on his having a backup plan in case being a comedian didn't work out, but he said he "strongly resisted" and they're now proud of him.

Abigail Steinberg, one of his three older sisters, is also in the arts field, working as a film director in Los Angeles. He'll be going to visit her there later this month and playing a small role in a pilot for a sitcom she's working on.

During a busy week, Steinberg does about 2-1/2 hours of stage work. He spends the rest of his time watching television, reading the news, or connecting with friends or others so he can get ideas to help him devise new material.

Although, like most comedians, Steinberg occasionally makes jokes about his girlfriend or other people or experiences from his life, he said most of the material is exaggerated and is "sprinkled with bits of truth here and there."

His girlfriend, who shares his downtown Toronto apartment, was embarrassed about being included in his act at first, but she has gotten used to it, he explained.

He also throws some Jewish jokes into his routine, but mostly relating to stereotypes.

"I hope that people can see how ridiculous the stereotypes are by me joking about them," he said.

Steinberg celebrates the Jewish holidays and said he feels he has some responsibility to hold on to his Jewish identity, considering there are only about 13 million Jews around the world.

"I think, genetically, Jews are funnier," he added with a smirk. "Well, maybe not genetically, but it's been passed down through our culture. It comes from being oppressed.

"When you're oppressed, you joke more. You've got nothing to lose. The oppressors don't have time to joke – they've got empires to run."

Steinberg admitted that he often gets nervous about performing in front of a crowd.

"It's part of what keeps you on your toes, though," he said. "If you get too comfortable, you're not in the moment."

He hopes that in the future he will get to the level where people come to shows specifically to see him. He also wants to do some writing for film and television.

He said if he were not a professional comedian he could possibly go back to his former job in the stockroom for Shoppers Drug Mart, or preferably be a cartoonist, which he dabbled with for a while. A number of his cartoons have appeared in the Ottawa Citizen.

Steinberg's advice for aspiring comedians is to enter the field when they're young and to write a lot.

"People should figure out what they'll do before their first performance," he said. "I wrote jokes for about three to four months before my first show. It helped me make a good impression."

Steinberg tries his jokes on friends, family and others first to see if they work. He recommends approaching different kinds of people to gauge their reactions, rather than simply going with what friends find funny.

Study helped kindle interest in our Jewish roots

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Irving Howe (1920-1993), the New York intellectual who was a zealous socialist all of his life, received what he called his 15 minutes of fame from a remarkable scholarly achievement that seemed a world apart from his leftist political convictions.

His book World of Our Fathers, which was published in 1976, became a national bestseller and gave Howe a new literary stature. Henceforth he would be regarded as much more than an editor and contributor to marginal leftist journals such as Dissent (which he co-founded in 1954), Commentary, Partisan Review and The New Republic.

Roughly three decades since it first appeared, World of Our Fathers remains one of the best and most thorough studies of the immigrant culture of the Jews of New York's Lower East Side and, by extrapolation, their co-religionists in Toronto, Montreal and other large cities. Its sweeping survey of the shared urban universe of the Jews who came from the shtetls of Europe to New York reveals an astonishing degree of research, methodically conducted over many years.

One gets the impression that Howe had read the autobiography of every Jewish-American immigrant who had ever set pen to paper, as well as every issue of the Yiddish Forward and other local Yiddish newspapers from the late 1890s onward.

The book opens with a simple yet sparkling historical insight: that the year 1881, with the political tumult that followed the assassination of the Russian Czar Alexander II, was a major turning point in Jewish history as decisive as the fall of the Second Temple or the expulsion of the Jews from Spain.

Fleeing the pogroms, the earliest refugees at Castle Garden had little sense that a critical mass of Jews would soon follow and make possible a rich and vital Jewish life in New York. But soon Ellis Island, which replaced Castle Garden as a landing centre, was processing thousands of Jewish immigrants every day.

The ordeal of steerage, the rise of the tenements, the slums and the sweatshops, the cheders and the cafés, the unions and landsmanshaft organizations – Howe inspected each aspect of immigrant life with the wide array of sources at his disposal. Possessing a commanding knowledge of Jewish arts and literature, he offered astute assessments of the contributions of key writers and poets from Abraham Cahan to Morris Rosenfeld, as well as the colourful demimonde of the Yiddish theatre centred on Second Avenue. These sections reflect such scholarly breadth that they might easily have stood as independent works.

In the section on Jewish Labor, Jewish Socialism, Howe noted that, for many, leftist politics and union activism were merely ways of Americanizing the Jewish worker at a time when the factory boss reigned supreme and the workplace was in desperate need of humanizing reforms. It is to his credit that he did not allow his political radicalism to taint his prose. Oddly enough, he seemed able to containerize his Marxist orthodoxy, which he kept apart from his esthetic sense of Jewish culture as religiously as an Orthodox Jew separates meat and dairy. But perhaps that's a poor analogy: kashrut was of little importance to Howe, a secular Jew who identified with the Jewish world primarily through the prisms of history, culture and the Yiddish language.

Howe was born Irving Horenstein in New York in 1920 to immigrant parents who ran a small grocery store. At 13, during a bout of scarlet fever, he sent his father to the public library for the complete works of Keats, Milton and Wordsworth, which he read with an intellectual fever and fervour that never abated.

As he mastered English literature, he also read voraciously in Yiddish and consumed every Marxist and Trotskyist tract he could find. He became so passionately committed to socialism and the cause of the oppressed poor that Sherwood Anderson's reports about striking North Carolina textile workers "brought tears of indignation to my eyes," he would recall. As a student he became the leader of the Trotskyist group at City College, and stood on tables making fiery speeches about the Spanish Civil War.

Yet his love of good prose and poetry remained a thing apart. Literature, he explained, added a non-political dimension to his worldview and gave him "a taste for complication, which is necessarily a threat to the political mind." As one of the famous New York intellectuals – a term of his own coinage – he argued that literature existed in a province outside of politics and should not be narrowly judged according to the party line of the Stalinists; he abhorred the philistine perception that literature was merely a convenient vehicle for political content. In various essays on modernist literature, he called for a wider, non-denominational view of literature that superseded political ideology.

Part of Howe's apartness, of course, was his encyclopedic knowledge of Yiddish literature, a factor that certainly spurred his return to his Jewish identity. If he has claim to another 15 minutes of fame beyond World of Our Fathers, it is because he commissioned the translation of an Isaac Bashevis Singer story from Yiddish into English, making the once-obscure Singer – who would win a Nobel prize and become the world's most famous Yiddish writer – accessible to an English-speaking readership for the first time. The story was Gimpel the Fool and the translator was Saul Bellow.

Beyond his role as a socialist theorist, Howe fulfilled a vital function as a cultural anthropologist, mining the riches of Yiddish culture and literature, and presenting the gleaming ore to the American public. In A Treasury of Yiddish Stories, the landmark anthology that he co-edited with Eliezer Greenberg in 1954, the two made works by Singer and other Yiddish writers easily accessible to mainstream readers for the first time. Bristling with insights and intelligence, the Treasury's long introductory essay remains required reading for students of Yiddish literature to this day.

Howe's dual talents as cultural anthropologist and literary critic reached a peak in his massive (more than 700 pages) masterwork World of Our Fathers. Usually celebrated as a tough political fighter in a regional intellectual arena that he shared with the likes of Norman Podhoretz, Dwight Macdonald, Alfred Kazin, Mary McCarthy and others, Howe seemed content to put aside his boxing gloves for the nonce and offer the reader a gentle, inviting bath of sweet nostalgia.

Eye on Arts

By BILL GLADSTONE

NATASHA AUTHOR DAVID BEZMOZGIS WRITES AND DIRECTS FEATURE FILM

Principal photography began this month on Victoria Day, a coming-of-age feature film written by David Bezmozgis, the Toronto-based author of the much-lauded short story collection Natasha and Other Stories.

Bezmozgis is also director of the film, which is being produced by Markham Street Films of Toronto. The company is operated by partners Judy Holm and Michael McNamara, both Gemini Award winners.

The story opens in Toronto during the Victoria Day long weekend of 1988. While attending a Bob Dylan concert, 16-year-old Ben Spektor observes a drug deal, the consequences of which have unpredictable effects on the rest of his summer and possibly his life. The incident initiates Ben into love as well as death, and forces him to confront his conscience, friends and family.

If Bezmozgis is as talented within the cinematic realm as he is as a writer, Victoria Day is bound to be a success. Filming is slated to continue until Oct. 1. The film is scheduled for release in 2009.

Videos investigate how politics, war affect Israelis

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Israeli lesbian army commanders. Middle-aged prostitutes. Sadomasochistic single guys who keep handcuffs in their bags. This isn't standard fare you'd see at an art gallery, but these are some of the subjects at the heart of an exhibit at Toronto's Gallery TPW by Israeli video artists Maayan Amir and Ruti Sela.

Running until Oct. 11, Life Stories focuses on how people react to a camera's probing eye and the power shift that occurs when they are free to confess honestly.

Curator Chen Tamir, who was raised in Toronto and spends half her time in New York, says the exhibit is "an investigation of the presence and effect the camera has, and about how people construct and project their identities through it."

Amir and Sela's Gallery TPW show includes Beyond Guilt, a video series that is being shown for the first time. Beyond Guilt includes footage of seedy Tel Aviv nightclubs, online dating encounters and confessions of veteran prostitutes. Tamir says the videos' tone evokes an Israeli attitude: "The rawness and unflinching humanity that come across in this work are a testament to how the political situation – occupation, terror and war – and obligatory military service in Israel affect how people construct their identity."

The videos show how politics and the army's allowance for regulated violence contribute to an Israeli's sexuality, Tamir adds. "This work is really an investigation of how Israelis navigate and temper a turmoil they are ineluctably embroiled in. And how they do so is not always pretty."

It's apparent Amir and Sela's work pushes boundaries. The unflinching portrait of nightclub perverts and brazen sex workers may make the viewer uncomfortable, which is all part of the emotional process of viewing the videos. "Life Stories asks the viewer what she wants out of a work of art, and what drives her as a spectator, or a voyeur," Tamir notes.

Sela, 34, studied film at Tel Aviv University and soon found herself showcasing video exhibits across the world. Her work has been shown in Sydney, France, Spain, New York and Berlin.

Amir, 30, lives in Tel Aviv and often works with Sela on various video projects.

Gallery TPW's current exhibit also features work by artists Meiro Koizumi from Japan and Tova Mozard from Sweden. But what do these artists have in common? They offer more questions than criticisms, Tamir says.

"What does it mean to make art about a real person, and what does it mean to view it? What kind of strange power does the camera have that it allows these relationships to form in the first place?"

Life Stories runs until Oct. 11 at Gallery TPW, 56 Ossington Ave. Admission is free. 416-645-1066

Abraham Inc. concocts tasty klezmer-funk blend

By DEBBIE WOLGELERENTER
Special to The CJN

If the idea of a klezmer-funk-hip-hop fusion supergroup sounds more like a novelty act than this past Ashkenaz festival's must-see-show, you may not realize how complementary these different genres really are.

Not unlike chocolate and peanut butter, traditional Jewish music and classic African-American music are two great tastes that taste great together.

This fact was indisputably proven when Abraham Inc. – the brainchild of renowned clarinetist David Krakauer, legendary funk trombonist Fred Wesley and Montreal's Yiddish hip-hop master Socalled (a.k.a. Josh Dolgin) – touched down Aug. 28 at Harbourfront Centre's Sirius Satellite Radio Stage. After gigs in France, Austria, Carnegie Hall and Harlem's historic Apollo Theater, the group chose the bi-annual New Yiddish Culture event for their eagerly anticipated Canadian debut.

Backed by an impressive five-piece band featuring Allen Watsky on guitar, Jerome Harris on bass and vocals, Michael Sarin on drums, Brandon Wright on saxophone and Freddie Hendrix on trumpet, the unsurprisingly tight ensemble wowed the mainly middle aged and older crowd, most of whom seemed unsure of what to expect prior to the show.

Krakauer and Wesley – who has worked with James Brown, George Clinton, Ike and Tina Turner, Count Basie and Curtis Mayfield, among others – are both famous in their respective fields, but most patrons attended the concert based on word-of-mouth alone. And while a few cuts are available online, the band has not yet released a full-length album.

Opening with Lies My Grandma Told Me, a rap about bubbe mayses set to the drum and bass beat of hip hop, Socalled asked "Are there any balabustes here tonight?" The resounding "Yes!" from the enthusiastic crowd set the tone for the evening of mutual appreciation and call-and-response.

Next up was The H-tune, a funked out version of Havah Nagilah with a soulful Harris sharing vocals with Kraukauer. After that, the audience sang along to the "lai dai dai" chorus of Push, some Yiddish-inspired soul by Wesley.

Following a shout-out to Krakauer's wife with the tune Miss N.C., the band brought down the house with the online hit Moskovitz and Loops of It. With its old-school klezmer looped over a propulsive percussive beat, the instrumental smash was the perfect mashup between old and new, with Krakauer's exhilarating horns exploding as the rhythm progressed and climaxed.

Other highlights of the evening included Wesley's Breaking Bread with My Momma, possibly the only R&B song to include a hamotzi lechem min haaretz break in the middle, and Kraukauer's tribute to his bandmate, Fred the Tzaddik.

Second only to the superb musicianship was the warmth and affection clearly evident between members of band – who shared solos equally and praised one another at every turn – and the clever onstage banter between and during songs.

At one point, Socalled asked if there were any local rappers in the house. When audience member Junior-T, a young African-Canadian, responded, he was required by security to rap just below the stage rather than on it (presumably for insurance purposes), causing Socalled to quip, "Bringing segregation to a whole new level!"

The audience's laughter and the undiminished enthusiasm of the young rapper – who was a surprisingly decent freestyler, even if he did rhyme "Toronto" with "pronto" – were indicative of the overall spirit of community and tolerance of the evening.

After playing for a good hour-and-a-half, the band was treated to a standing ovation by the uncharacteristically boisterous Ashkenaz crowd. Encouraged to remain standing, audience members sang and swayed along to These Are the Good Old Days and Fred Wesley's funk classic Gonna Have a House Party.

If you missed the show, look for a podcast of it online at cbc.ca/radio2, as Canada Live was there recording the show for its national live music showcase.

Israeli director makes history with animated documentary

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In Waltz with Bashir, Israeli film director Ari Folman breaks new ground.

Screened at the Toronto International Film Festival, the film is, by his reckoning, the first full-length animated documentary in the history of cinema.

Revolving around Israel's controversial 1982 invasion of Lebanon, it's inspired by Folman's experiences as a young foot soldier in that war.

Folman, who is based in Tel Aviv, was drawn to the topic after he turned 40 and asked the army to excuse him from further reserve duty. Having made that request, he was referred by the military to a therapist.

In therapy, he realized that there were many "black holes" in his memory concerning the war, and that he had a need to investigate that tumultuous period in his life. Folman had forgotten, or repressed, the first day of the war, as well as the Sabra and Shatila massacres, which occurred in west Beirut as the war wound down.

In an effort to piece together the story, Folman consulted friends and acquaintances who had been there and could refresh his memory.

Indeed, Waltz with Bashir unfolds as Folman meets an old friend at a bar in Tel Aviv. The friend, Boaz Rein Buskila, recalls a recurring nightmare in which he is chased by a pack of wild black dogs nipping at his heels.

Waltz With Bashir* began its creative journey as a video.

The dogs are not a figment of his imagination. On the first day of battle, Buskila was given a special assignment. He was ordered to shoot baying dogs in a Lebanese village that was being surrounded by an Israeli patrol.

Having successfully forged a connection between Buskila's nightmare and the war, Folman went on to talk with several other vets, a war correspondent and two therapists, all of whom assisted him in filling in the blanks.

In an interview at the festival, Folman said he went through "a major psychological upheaval" during the four years he and his associates laboured on the film. As he put it, "I discovered a lot of heavy stuff about my past."

From the outset, Folman intended to portray the war through the medium of an animated documentary, proceeding from the assumption that this form would give him untrammeled freedom.

"War is so surreal, and memory is so tricky, that I thought I'd better go along the memory journey with the help of some very fine illustrators."

In fact, the animated documentary was not entirely new to him. Years before, Folman directed a TV series, The Material That Love Is Made Of, in which he opened each segment with a three-minute animated scene. "It worked so well that I knew a feature length animated documentary about the war would eventually work."

Waltz with Bashir, however, began its creative journey as a video and then as a story board that was transformed into an animated documentary.

Director Ari Folman

Folman initially supported the war. But on the second day, he abruptly changed his mind. "It was not a defensive war. We were not defending our country."

He said Israel moved way beyond its stated war aims, as enunciated by the prime minister at the time, Menachem Begin. "The war was a turning point," Folman said. "There was a total breakdown between the people of Israel and the leadership of Israel."

In addition, due in large part to the the Sabra and Shatila incident, in which the Christian Lebanese Phalange militia killed as many as 2,000 Palestinian civilians within sight of the Israeli army, Folman concluded that war is a bloody-minded exercise in futility.

He and his unit were stationed only 300 metres from the two Palestinian refugee camps that were attacked by the Phalange, Israel's ally. "We didn't see anything, but we heard shots all night," he recalled. "We were ordered to fire flares, which helped the Phalange."

In his view, Israel could have stopped the massacres much earlier.

Folman also opposed the 2006 war in Lebanon, signing a petition against it. "It seemed like deja vu."

Rightly or wrongly, he is convinced that Ariel Sharon would not have launched that war had he still been prime minister. "He learned his lesson in 1982, when he was defence minister. He was a clever guy."

According to Folman, Waltz with Bashir – which was hailed at the Cannes Film Festival as a powerful and compelling film and is scheduled to open in Toronto next winter – was well received in Israel on both the left and the right of the political spectrum.

Folman, whose family immigrated to Israel from Lodz, Poland, in the 1950s, studied film after completing his army service and returning from an extended trip to southeast Asia.

"Film, for me, was a natural way to express myself as a storyteller," he explained.

His graduate school film, Comfortably Numb, which dealt with the 1991 Gulf War, won the Israeli Academy Award for best documentary.

From 1991 onward, he directed television documentaries, mainly on Israel's presence in the territories.

His first feature, Santa Clara, based on a novel by a Czech author, garnered seven Israeli Oscars.

In the near future, he plans to make an animated film about a world controlled by a pharmaceutical company. "It's science fiction," he said.

Folman is confident that Israel and the Palestinians will settle their differences within a two-state solution.

"But we don't have the right leadership for that to happen now," he said, adding that former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin could have pulled off this feat had he not been assassinated.

Spamalot: the tale of brave Sir Robin

By RITA POLIAKOV
Special to The CJN

Sir Robin, one of King Arthur's Knights of the Round Table, is on a quest for the Holy Grail. In order to find the grail, he and King Arthur must produce a successful Broadway musical.

And, according to the knight, played by James Beaman, there's only one way to succeed in New York. "Listen, Arthur darling, closely to this news," Beaman's character sings in the Broadway musical Monty Python's Spamalot. "We won't succeed on Broadway if you don't have any Jews."

If Sir Robin's right, then Beaman is the key to the play's success, because he is the only Jewish person in the cast or crew.

"It's kind of fun to be the one and only," he said.

Beaman has been touring with Spamalot since last December. The tour stopped in Toronto recently, at the Canon Theatre, where the show runs until Oct. 5.

Beaman started his theatrical career when he was 12 years old. He played Prince Arthur in King John, one of Shakespeare's lesser known plays.

"I had to play this boy who was abducted and imprisoned. It was a very dramatic role for a 12-year-old to play," he said.

Beaman grew up in a theatrical family. His father was a set designer and an assistant professor at Boston University, and his mother was a playwright, director, actress and acting teacher.

"Pretty much, I was in it from the beginning," he said. "I grew up in theatre. By 12 to 13, I was doing professional work."

As a teenager, Beaman studied acting at his mother's acting school, and eventually he enrolled in the theatre program at Boston University.

While Beaman enjoyed classical theatre, he soon became known for his work in cabaret.

"When I was out of [school], I came back to work. For fun, I put together a cabaret act for a friend, who was a director. [The act] took on a life of its own. I sort of found myself almost accidentally as a nightclub performer for eight years," he said.

Beaman began his cabaret career in Boston with Bacall: By Herself, in which Beaman portrayed musical theatre and film star Lauren Bacall. Bacall: By Herself eventually brought Beaman to New York, where he portrayed actress Marlene Dietrich in three cabaret pieces.

After almost a decade in cabaret, Beaman decided to switch gears.

"I started doing cabaret work as a way to get exposure, but it was turning into a full-time career. I really wanted to do theatre. I went back to school and refocused my energy on doing classical work. I spent about three years doing nothing but Shakespeare," he said.

The skills Beaman learned during his cabaret performances transferred to classical theatre.

"Performance is performance," he said. "Because I was a solo performer [in my cabaret acts] it gave me a lot of confidence on stage. I was doing very strong character work, impersonating famous people with a larger-than-life sensibility, so really, it wasn't such an extreme shift. Shakespeare was close to my heart," he said.

Along with giving him confidence, Beaman's cabaret career helped jump-start his day job as a makeup artist.

"These are what we call survival jobs," Beaman said, adding that when not acting, he's taught Pilates. "When living in New York City and paying New York rent, you're not always working in your profession."

After learning to apply his own makeup for his cabaret characters, Beaman ended up working for various cosmetic companies. He also worked as a makeup artist for weddings and other events.

"Hopefully, Spamalot will continue, and I won't have to have a day job," Beaman said.

He had to audition three times before getting the role of Sir Robin.

"I love the physical experience of musical theatre. Spamalot, on the surface, is a silly piece," he said of the comedic musical that was made from a 1975 movie. "But the piece is extremely sophisticated."

In Toronto, for the first time, Beaman said that "Americans are woefully ignorant about Canada. We're not entirely sure of what Canadian culture is. I've been to Vancouver, B.C., Edmonton, Alta., and Calgary, Alta. [The cities] couldn't have been more different. I hear that Toronto is very much like New York in terms of diversity and cultural savvy."

Catholic painter commemorates Poland's Jewish past

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Catholic artist's works range far and wide, from surrealism to realism.

The Jewish inhabitants of Wierzbnik, a town in southern Poland now known as Starachowice, were deported to the Treblinka death camp in the autumn of 1942, killed there in cold blood like tens of thousands of other Polish Jews.

In an instant, a venerable Jewish community, comprising about one-quarter of the town's population, was obliterated from the face of the earth.

But for Maciej Frankiewicz, a 40-year-old Polish Catholic painter who was born and still lives in Starachowice, the Jews of Wierzbnik never really died.

"They are present in spirit," said Frankiewicz, whose exhibition, Visions of Wierzbnik: The Art of Maciej Frankiewicz, was featured at this month's Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture in Toronto. "Just because they were murdered doesn't mean they have disappeared."

Frankiewicz, whose birth coincided with a state-sponsored anti-Semitic campaign that gutted what remained of Poland's postwar Jewish community, has spent about half his life preserving the memory of the Jews of Wierzbnik.

Apart from his paintings, he and his wife, Anita – the parents of 10 children – participated in the restoration of Wierzbnik's Jewish cemetery, where more than 400 tombstones were cleaned and set upright again.

As well, he played a role in the creation of a Jewish memorial room in Starachowice's cultural centre, where some of his paintings are displayed.

In an interview conducted through an interpreter on the final day of Ashkenaz, Frankiewicz said that, as a child during the communist era, he would play in Wierzbnik's neglected Jewish cemetery.

He did not know any Jews, since there were none in his town after World War II, and he was barely conversant with the Holocaust, since it was not on his school's curriculum.

Nevertheless, he was drawn to Starachowice's Jewish past, and as a boy, he sketched buildings of the former Jewish quarter.

On his wedding day, he received an unusual gift, a drum with Hebrew letters, that drew him still deeper into Poland's symbiotic relationship with Jews. Out of curiosity, he and his new bride disassembled the drum and discovered that it was made from a fragment of a Torah scroll taken from Wierzbnik's synagogue.

"It illustrated for us the traumatic brutal force of Nazism," said Anita, a journalist who has written articles about Poland's pre-war Jewish community in the local press.

Frankiewicz produced his first Jewish-themed painting in 1989, when the Solidarity trade union movement formed Poland's first non-communist government in decades.

Since then, Frankiewicz has painted more than 120 canvases, some of which have been bought by Jewish visitors on sentimental journeys to Poland.

Although he appears to be the only artist in Starachowice who focuses on Jews, he has found the names of young Polish painters on the Internet who share his interest and passion.

Frankiewicz's paintings, which are surreal, realistic and romantic, range far and wide, at least judging by his exhibit at Ashkenaz.

Coachman at an Inn (1998), Wierzbnik Marketplace (1992) and Wierzbnik Synagogue on Yom Kippur (1992) summon up images of pre-war Poland, while Death of the Village (2001) crackles with the terror of the Holocaust.

Frankiewicz, who holds that Poland's history would be incomplete without its Jewish dimension, has drawn inspiration from various quarters. He has consulted historical data, photographs and written records, and he has been animated by dreams and his imagination.

Eric Stein, Ashkenaz's artistic director, stumbled upon his works in 1999 while on a visit to Starachowice, whose current population is about 65,000.

Stein – whose late grandfather was born and raised in Wierzbnik and immigrated to Canada in 1928 – was "blown away" by Frankiewicz's virtuosity and his commitment to preserving Wierzbnik's Jewish legacy.

Frankiewicz, a gardener by trade, restored its Jewish cemetery with the cooperation and assistance of Starachowice/Wierzbniker societies in Canada, Israel and the United States.

"I regarded it as a mission," said Frankiewicz, who conducts school tours of the cemetery.

As far as he knows, Wierzbnik was home to some 3,500 Jews prior to the war. Shortly after the town was occupied by the German army in 1939, the local synagogue was burned to the ground. Three years later, in late October, the Jewish residents were deported, not to be seen again.

To the best of his knowledge, there is not a single Jew living in Starachowice today. "If there are any Jews, they are very assimilated and keeping a low profile," he said.

Frankiewicz, who has studied Hebrew, visited Israel in 1999 and liked it. "I felt like I was meeting my family."

He cannot understand why some of his fellow Poles dislike, even hate, Jews. "Anti-semitism," he observed, "is basically a mental disorder."

Jsport offers co-ed sports for young Jews

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

A few years ago, Mattea Wintre was looking to get involved in athletics in the Jewish community, but she found there was nothing available, not even in co-ed sports.

She could have joined the Toronto Central Sport and Social Club, an organization that does offer co-ed as well as women's sports, but eager to actively participate in athletics with her Jewish peers, Wintre decided to create Jsport.

Its third softball season recently came to an exciting conclusion when the green team rallied for three runs in the bottom of the 10th inning to capture the championship game at June Rowlands Park, at Mount Pleasant Road and Davisville Avenue, in Toronto. The league's six teams played on Wednesday nights beginning at the end of May.

In forming the city's only social, co-ed Jewish sports league for people 18 and older, Wintre has given young Jewish professionals and Birthright Israel alumni an opportunity to strengthen their connection to the community through sport.

"I was looking for something Jewish to participate in and get involved in the community," said Wintre, who led a couple of Birthright trips. "I thought sport was a great way to do that."

Having enjoyed sports throughout her life and having worked with Parks and Recreation Ontario, Wintre has always believed that sport and recreation can be used as a vehicle for personal development. She sees her organization in much the same way.

Growing up, she attended United Synagogue Day School before enrolling in the performing arts program at Earl Haig Secondary School, where she majored in dance. Wintre went on to study kinesiology at York University, spending a year at Hebrew University along the way.

She runs the daily operations of Jsport and gets help from her dad, David, who came out each week to umpire the games.

"The best part of this is not the games, it's the post-game, seeing the kids talking to one another, staying in contact with one another," he said.

This year, there were close to 100 players in the league, with a waiting list of others eager to get in. A men's team was formed in August as Jsport submitted an entry into the Pitch for Israel tournament held at Camp Robin Hood, an event that raised money for Jewish families living below the poverty line in Israel and Toronto.

Jsport will offer its second season of indoor beach volleyball beginning in January at Beach Blast.

Israeli rower wins bronze medal at Paralympics

BEIJING — Rower Eli Nawi finished third in the men's single sculls-A event last week, bringing Israel's medal count at the Beijing Paralympic Games to four – three silver and one bronze.

He finished in a time of five minutes and 39.11 seconds. The event was making its debut at the Paralympics.

In other results involving Israeli teams, the men's wheelchair basketball team lost to Great Britain, 82-67, in its final preliminary match. The Israelis finished fourth in Group B with a 2-4 record and advanced to the quarter-finals, where they will meet defending gold medalist Canada.

In wheelchair tennis, Boaz Kramer and Shraga Weinberg advanced to the gold-medal match in mixed doubles-quad with a 6-6, 6-4 semi-finals victory over the second-seeded British pair. The Israelis were to face the top-seeded U.S. team of David Wagner and Nick Taylor.

"I don't know how to say it. It's the greatest moment in my life right now," Kramer told the Olympic News Service.

"Right now we will be celebrating for a couple of hours, and tomorrow morning the first thing is to think about the next match, the gold-medal match," he said. "I think if we performed as well as today, we will have a chance."

In the equestrian individual freestyle test final, Omer Ben Dor finished 13th out of 15.

A gift for the new year

Years ago, I was looking after the grandfather of a younger colleague. His grandfather had chosen geriatrics as a specialty early on in its development in Canada.

I had previously seen his grandfather, who was in his 90s, for medical problems, all of which had been resolved. Now the reason for the consultation was different – he was nearing his 100th birthday and had requested a different ophthalmologist for his birthday gift.

The Senior Side of Life

The ophthalmologist he had seen for the previous five years had discounted the potential benefits of exposing him to cataract extraction with, "After all, you are 95, or 96, or 98. Is this really what you want at this age?" Now as his children asked him what he would like for his 100th birthday, he said, "A new ophthalmologist." They complied, and that ophthalmologist asked me whether he was "fit" for a local anesthetic cataract extraction.

It was clear from my examination that he would tolerate the surgery that eventually occurred without problems, and as a result he had useful and meaningful vision until he died some years later. The case was not my first in which a frail elder was able to benefit from a cataract extraction under circumstances that had not been initially considered.

Early on in my career, not long after an ophthalmologist, with whom I had done residency training years before, came on staff as a consultant at Baycrest. He asked about a resident of the Home for the Aged, who had the reputation of being a "shrier" (someone who spent a good deal of time yelling). It wasn't clear to the nurses or to his family what he was yelling about. It had been attributed to physical discomfort, but a cause could not be found and simple analgesia did not seem to have a salutary effect.

He was found, during a routine eye examination, to have significant cataracts. Initially, the family was reluctant to consider the surgery as their father had some degree of dementia and they were worried about possible deleterious effects. After the ophthalmologist explained that the surgery could be done under local anesthetic and I could find no medical reason to reject the possibility, he had the procedure.

Like magic, within a few days of his patch coming off his eye, he stopped yelling and started to interact meaningfully with those around him. Cognitively impaired he was, but he was no longer visually disconnected from the world. He loved to sit by the elevators and watch people getting on and off, and he had a kibbitz with them – although limited, the conversations made sense.

I recently heard from one of our ophthalmologists how often conditions are found during routine or followup eye examination appointments for already recognized conditions. Something is often discovered that, when treated, could have a positive effect on vision.

He described a case in which a patient's eye pressures were noted to be very much higher than in the previous year. The patient had already lost some of the vision to glaucoma. Proper treatment restored some of the borderline impaired vision and would likely prevent further visual deterioration. Whether it is one of the common conditions of the elderly, cataracts, glaucoma or macular degeneration, or something less common, recognizing a condition is necessary in order to consider potential treatments.

In the new year, make sure your loved one gets a proper eye examination so that everything that can be done to correct eye problems is done. It is a wonderful gift with the apple and honey.

Of instruction and education

Epi on Education

A few weeks ago, as we read the Ten Commandments in Parshat Va'etchanan, we also read the famous paragraph that the rabbis designated as the first section of the Shema, a prayer central to all of Jewish liturgy.

Seymour Epstein

"Hear, O Israel! The Lord is our God, the Lord alone." The text goes on to instruct us that we must "teach [these words] to your children and speak of them at home and on the road, when you lie down and when you rise up." The Torah uses the verb shinantem, and the Talmud teaches us that this is the kind of targeted teaching that produces erudition. As a method, it speaks of repetition, which we know to be a valuable tool in instruction.

It would seem that the first phrase, shinantem levanecha, should be sufficient. In itself, this is an early prescription for transmitting the knowledge of one generation to the next – the very beginnings of formal education. Why, then, was the second phrase, vedibarta bam, added?

I have come to realize that the first phrase can apply to what we usually term instruction, in contradistinction to the second phrase, which is about education.

Instruction is the transmission of knowledge (e.g., texts, languages, etc.) in a formal setting such as a classroom or an Internet site. Education, while it can include instruction, is much broader in its scope and objectives. It's about the wider messages that are life-critical, for which the facts of knowledge are mere means to an end. One doesn't instruct in the realm of values. One lives values at home, on the road, at night and in the morning.

Both instruction in the formal sense and education in its broader perspective are critical tools in the ongoing transmission of what really matters to our children, and to theirs. As the school year begins and as we prepare ourselves for 5769, let's blend the two both at school and at home.

Bakery fills kosher meat void in north Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — It looks like the final curtain has fallen on Omnitsky Fine Foods, Winnipeg's last kosher butcher shop.

Since no one has come forward to buy and reopen Omnitsky, which closed at the end of April, the store and its equipment are slated to go on the auction block Sept. 20.

But for Jews in Winnipeg's north end who are concerned about being left without kosher meat by Omnitsky's closing, there are now two new alternatives. (South-end residents can buy frozen imported kosher meat at either the privately owned Desserts Plus or the Sobey's supermarket in the area.)

At the beginning of September, Gunn's Bakery on Selkirk Avenue added frozen, packaged kosher meat to its selection of bakery and cheese products.

Gunn's is one of two longstanding kosher bakeries in Winnipeg. (The other, City Bread, is best known for its rye and sells its products across Canada.) Gunn's has been in business at the same north Winnipeg location for 71 years.

"The north end wasn't being well served as far as the availability of kosher meat was concerned," said Arthur (Fivie) Gunn, who lives in the north end and co-owns Gunn's with his brother, Bernie.

"A lot of people still live north," he said. "We felt that [carrying kosher meat] would make their lives a little easier."

Gunn's is bringing in Shefa meat products from Toronto. The selection thus far includes roasts, briskets, stewing meat, hot dogs and other pre-sliced deli meats in small quantities. Gunn's is also selling Chai chickens from Toronto.

"We intend to expand the variety of meat products that we are bringing in response to customer demands," Gunn said.

He said Gunn's won't be using the meat in its catering or opening packages and cutting the meat. "We are just buying and selling," he said.

An IGA store in north Winnipeg actually began bringing in kosher meats and chickens in small quantities two years ago, when Omnitsky first ran afoul of the local hechsher agency and temporarily lost its kashrut certification. At the time, Wayne Hamel, owner of IGA on Main, expressed unhappiness with the quality of the meat that was being shipped to him from Toronto, as well as about the prices he had to charge for the product.

"We have continually carried Chai chicken for the past two years, and demand is continuing to grow," said Steve Boyle, the store's meat manager. "We used to have to restock twice a week. Now we restock daily."

IGA has recently been bringing in some beef and deli meat products from Continental in Montreal, and the products have been selling well, Boyle said.

"We have had a lot of requests for luncheon meat," he said. "The product we are getting in now [including hot dogs, salami, bologna, pastrami] is nice. We also have some roasts and briskets coming in for the holidays."

And there is hope once again that locally slaughtered kosher meat – with resulting lower prices – will be available here in the not-too-distant future.

The community has been without fresh kosher meat since the vaad discontinued local shchitah two years ago, at the same time as Omnitsky's kashrut certification was revoked. A consortium of cattle producers are operating a beef slaughtering and processing facility in an industrial area of Winnipeg that will include a kosher slaughtering line.

The company behind the slaughtering and processing facility, Natural Prairie Beef, has been working with kashrut consultant Sid Estrin of Edmonton. Estrin said he operated a kosher slaughtering facility in Illinois several years ago and has been working as a consultant to the kosher slaughtering industry in locales such as New York and the American Midwest.

The plant is scheduled to be operational some time in 2010.

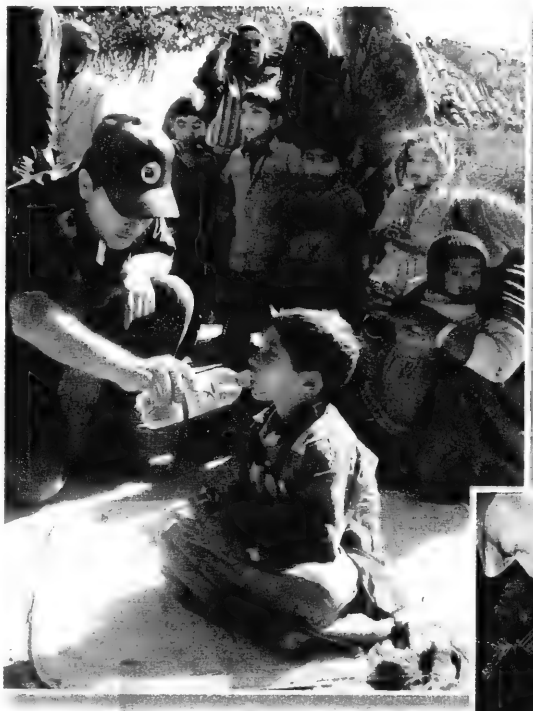
Helping where help is needed



A file photo shows an Israeli army medical team, operating out of a field hospital that it established near the city of Bhuj, India, ministering to the young and old after the Gujarat province in India was devastated by an earthquake in 2001. The toll of the quake was heavy: 19,403 people were killed and 68,478 injured.

[Israel Sun photos]

Editorial

More than 4,000 kilometres from their home in Israel, a team of doctors and other medical crews rushed to India to establish a field hospital to save as many lives as they could, to help heal as many injured as they could, in the quick aftermath of an earthquake that devastated the area of Gujarat and took the lives of many of the vulnerable human beings who lived there. In all, some 19,500 people were killed in the quake, and nearly 70,000 were hurt.

In the photos on this page, Israeli doctors are ministering expertly yet tenderly to the youngest, and presumably the neediest, of the city of Bhuj, which suffered the greatest devastation.

These two particular scenes are near Bhuj in January 2001. But variations of those heart-rending scenes have been the hallmark of Israeli humanitarianism since the founding of the Jewish state.

The list of humanitarian missions in which Israel has participated is long. Whenever possible, whenever the country struck by disaster allowed them to enter, rescue and medical teams from Israel have been dispatched to help locate and save lives that still dangled by threads of hope and possibility. At times, the missions were to help in the reconstruction. At other times, the missions were simply to send much needed medical and other supplies.

The following is a partial list of such missions: Mexico in 1985, Armenia in 1988, Romania in 1989, Turkey and Greece in 1999, Kosovo in 1990, Kenya in 1991, New Orleans in 2005, South East Asia in 2004, Kenya (again) in 2006, China and Georgia just this year.

Despite the unceasing defamation of Israel by its enemies, the Jewish state's well-demonstrated devotion to humanitarianism should surprise no one.

For helping where help is needed is a seminal Jewish value and very much at the centre of the teachings of our faith.

On High Holidays we all desire to gain a vote

Dear friends,

We share these thoughts with you right in the midst of a federal election campaign. Election time is decision time. For those running, it is an odd feeling. On the one hand, all who are elected will have some power, even if the party they represent is not part of the government. On the other hand, the only way that they can have any power is by truly representing their constituents. So, until the voters say yes to them, they have no real power.

For us, Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are similar to an election. We are all in a campaign, with the desire to gain a vote. The vote we all really want, the only vote that ultimately matters, is God's vote for us. We want

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

God to vote us "in" to life, health, vigour, contentment, meaning and more.

The question before us is a simple one: how do we earn that vote? Ironically, we earn it the same way that candidates try to earn votes: by making promises and firmly embracing commitments.

There is one catch: the promises must be ones that we genuinely resolve to keep. Otherwise, the process is an empty charade.

It does sound somewhat odd, even problematic, to see the Days of Awe as being like an election campaign. Look at it another way. Whatever wishes we have for ourselves and our families are just that – wishes. We dare not demand, because demand suggests entitlement. And entitlement borders on arrogance.

We wish, we humbly ask, and we combine the "ask" with the awareness that simultaneous with our asking of God, we must ask of ourselves. It cannot be a one-sided relationship of all ask and no give.

After that, we leave the rest to God.

What should we be asking of ourselves? Generally, to be our best, to do our best. This means taking life seriously, living up to our sacred calling, faithfully living up to our responsibilities, and to add a bit of seasoning to all this, allocating some time to helping others.

It makes Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur all the more meaningful if we give it our best, if we make the best possible "pitch."

Sylvain Abitbol

In the year that we have served as co-presidents of Canadian Jewish Congress, we have met many volunteers, both inside and outside the Jewish community, who are deeply devoted to others. These are people we greatly respect and admire. And we have gained an intensified appreciation of the professionals at Canadian Jewish Congress who eat, sleep and breathe for the community.

There is much more to do, and we are looking forward to the challenges, which are made all the more achievable because of the great team of professionals and volunteers.

We all have within us the power to do significant things with our lives. That is an endearing power that along the way will gain for us God's vote that this be a year of good signs for all: "Tehay shnat siman tov –tav shin samech tet."

The writ has been dropped. Let the voting begin. Shanah Tovah to you and all.

Cotler urges legal sanctions against Iranian leader

'People don't realize they can intervene to prevent genocide'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In attempting to come to grips with the nuclear threat posed by Iran and its firebrand president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, some western nations have tried negotiations while others, notably Israel, have considered a military strike.

Neither option appeals much to Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, Canada's former justice minister and attorney general. The talks have proven unproductive and a military solution is far from ideal, he said.

Instead, he proposes a third way: bring Ahmadinejad to justice by employing international law and charging him – and Iran – with promoting genocide.

Cotler was scheduled to be in Washington this week to present a "Responsibility to Protect" petition to the "Conference on State-Sanctioned Incitement to Genocide: What Can Be Done?" The event is sponsored by the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs and the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

It was to take place Sept. 23, coinciding with Ahmadinejad's address to the United Nations General Assembly. Attendance at the conference was by invitation-only, and its 120 participants were scheduled to include members of the U.S. Congress, their staff, the media and diplomats.

Cotler planned to highlight the petition, which has been signed by an impressive roster of anti-genocide activists, including Nobel laureate Eli Wiesel; Salih Mahmoud Osman, a human rights activist on behalf of Darfur and a member of Parliament in Sudan, and Esther Mujawayo, a survivor of the Rwanda genocide.

The petition calls on Canada, the United States, the European Union and the UN Security Council to employ all available legal remedies against Ahmadinejad, including the Genocide Convention, which Iran has signed.

Irwin Cotler

Cotler said Ahmadinejad has made Iran's genocidal intent clear on numerous occasions by demonizing the State of Israel and predicting its destruction, as well as by calling Jews satanic enemies of mankind, arming Israel's genocidal terrorist enemies Hezbollah and Hamas, and developing the capacity to deliver nuclear weapons.

Cotler said the world community has a responsibility to protect potential genocide victims, and international law provides the means to do so. But he noted that in the 60 years since the adoption of the Genocide Convention, nothing was done to prevent genocide in Rwanda and Sudan. Legal action was only undertaken after the fact.

The international community "has the responsibility to prevent this genocide [by Iran] so we don't go down that road," Cotler said in a phone interview from Montreal.

Bringing Iran to justice would have several beneficial outcomes, he continued.

"The very process of initiating these remedies will embolden the progressive forces in Iran" and delegitimize Ahmadinejad, Cotler said. It would also embarrass corporations that are doing business in Iran, and

A NEW YEAR
A NEW BEGINNING

Rosh Hashana is traditionally a time to look back at the year just past. It is also a time of looking forward to a New Year... a new beginning.

May this New Year be one of peace. Peace of mind, peace of spirit, and may it bring peace and a new beginning to the people of Israel.

Livni's rise prompts analyses of peace prospects

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

As of this writing, media reports and analysis of Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni's narrow (one per cent) victory in the Sept. 17 Kadima primary were just beginning to appear.

The Sept. 18 National Post gave Livni's win scant attention in a 100-word Agence France-Presse piece titled "Israeli Foreign Minister new Kadima leader." In contrast, the Sept. 18 Globe and Mail ran "Livni enters eye of Israel's political storm" by Mark MacKinnon on its front page – a page otherwise dominated by the Canadian federal election and the continuing financial crisis on Wall Street.

MacKinnon remarked that Livni faces the challenge of forming a new government and also continuing to negotiate with the Palestinians.

Like many journalists, he noted that Livni began her political career on the right, then followed her mentor, former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon, to the Kadima party and the acceptance of a two-state solution to the Palestinian conflict. This view is reflective of the broad political centre in Israel today.

MacKinnon quoted Tamar Hermann, a director of the Tami Steinmetz Centre for Peace Research at Tel Aviv University, on Livni: "She's not a peacenik in any way... She will continue, even intensify the negotiations with the Palestinians. But as for the Iran issue, I don't think there will be any difference with Tzipi Livni or any other prime minister, because Israel's actions will be determined by the security apparatuses."

Along with all other Israeli leaders, Livni rejects any "right of return" for Palestinian refugees and has said that any future Palestinian state would have to be "demilitarized." She has also warned against Israel being "pressured" into an agreement that could be destabilizing.

While a full assessment of how the media responded to Livni's victory can't yet be made, it's worth noting some of the reports during the run-up to the primary.

In its Sept. 17 editorial "Securing Israel's future," the Toronto Star acknowledged that while Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's rule was sapped by corruption charges, he nevertheless tried to advance the peace process, and articulated the need to keep Israel both Jewish and democratic.

The Star quoted Olmert's recent pronouncement that "Greater Israel is over. There is no such thing."

The editorial went on to note that "Olmert, like many Israelis, didn't always feel that way." Olmert was quoted as saying: "But ultimately, after a long and tortured process, I arrived at the conclusion that we must share with those we live with, if we don't want to be a bi-national state."

The paper noted that most Israelis favour a two-state solution "provided Israel's security is guaranteed." Unfortunately, today the same majority fears that such security is not going to be provided by the Palestinians, something the Star, along with other media, might explore in more detail.

Michael Bell, former Canadian ambassador to Israel and the Palestinian Authority areas, also analyzed the change in Kadima leadership in "Time runs out as Israeli, Palestinian leaders near an accord" (Globe and Mail, Sept. 16).

Bell was far from sanguine about the prospects of an agreement between Israel and the Palestinian Authority being reached any time soon, especially with Olmert about to resign and PA President Mahmoud Abbas "vulnerable to political infighting and threats from Hamas."

Bell cautioned: "The Palestinian president is the last bastion of an increasingly despairing secular Palestinian nationalist movement. Within this community, talk of a single bi-national state combining Israelis and Palestinians is on the uptake. Such a position is not taken for selfless reasons. Rather, it is the view of some that that the only way to conquer Israel is demographically, from within."

Bell is to be commended for spelling out what for many (including, it must be said, some radical Jewish "post-Zionists") is at the heart of bi-nationalism: the elimination of Israel as the homeland of the Jewish People.

As fair as the Star's Sept. 17 editorial was, the appearance that day of a slew of letters, almost all of which were critical of Israel, raises the question of the paper's commitment to fairness and balance. One trusts that this is an anomaly that the paper will examine.

See JN CELEBRATING 60 YEARS OF ISRAEL

THE BEGINNING OF THE SECOND INTIFADAH

After then-Israeli opposition leader Ariel Sharon visited the Temple Mount, right, on Sept. 28, 2000, Palestinians rioted. As disclosed some years later by Palestinian politician Marwan Barghouti, who is currently in jail in Israel for organizing terror attacks, the rioting was orchestrated by the Fatah Tanzim, a group associated with then-Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat. The violence escalated and spiralled into the second intifadah in which, eventually, some 2,000 Palestinians and 700 Israelis were killed. Four years before Sharon's walk on the Temple Mount, Palestinians rioted for several days after a gate to the Western Wall Tunnels under the Arab Quarter of the Old City was opened to the public. The riots began after false rumours were deliberately spread that the second entrance gate endangered the foundations of the Al-Aqsa Mosque. [Israel and RNS photos]

OSCE initiative said to advance Mideast peace

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israel doesn't have diplomatic relations with Algeria, but at an international forum in Toronto last week, an Israeli parliamentarian took the opportunity to address his North African counterpart with a reminder of Israel's desire for peace.

Reuven Rivlin, a member of the Knesset, told a meeting of the parliamentary assembly of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) – and specifically the Algerian delegate who had spoken just before him – that "Israelis from the right and the left think peace is the name of the game in the Middle East. We are trying to achieve peace" while avoiding "illusions" of peace.

Israel, he continued, is eager to co-operate with its neighbours and from experience knows that "Negotiations bring us to nowhere. But once we co-operate, we can achieve a lot."

Senator Jerry Grafstein

Rivlin's brief remarks were delivered at the "Mediterranean Forum," the opening session of the OSCE's fall meeting, held at Toronto's Fairmont Royal York Hotel and titled "The OSCE in an Open World: Trade, Security and Migration."

The Mediterranean session was devoted, in part, to exploring a proposal advanced by French President Nicolas Sarkozy for an economic union that would promote development in Mediterranean countries and forestall the social disintegration that has led to illegal immigration to Europe. The main item on the OSCE agenda, however, was the conflict in Georgia.

Senator Jerry Grafstein, vice-president of the OSCE's parliamentary assembly, believes free trade and the resulting economic development "can put the Middle East on a track for peace."

In remarks to the conference, attended by about 200 representatives from 49 countries, Grafstein said "history teaches us that free trade has always been a harbinger of the rule of law."

Economic development precedes political development, and he suggested it could help promote political stability in the Mediterranean basin. One-third of the population in that region and the Near East are under 15 years of age, and another one-third are under 35. GDP, education and job creation are low, with the result that "idle youth are attracted to extremist ideology." Economic co-operation between France and Germany following World War II led eventually to the Common Market and ultimately to the EU, and trade in the Mediterranean region can create jobs for young people, he said.

Sarkozy's proposal for a Mediterranean Union, formally known as the Barcelona Process: Union for the Mediterranean, was introduced on July 13 at a summit of European Union (EU) and Mediterranean leaders in Paris. The OSCE is a partnership of 56 states and 11 partners for co-operation, including Algeria, Egypt, Israel, Jordan, Morocco, and Tunisia.

Speaking through an interpreter, French delegate and Sarkozy adviser Gilles Montre told the meeting that the job creation rate in North Africa is insufficient to keep up with population growth. Canada, the United States and Japan are more successful than European countries in investing wealth abroad, and he suggested economic co-operation could lead to political co-operation.

Rivlin said Israel is pleased to participate in OSCE initiatives, and he noted that Sarkozy had described his Mediterranean proposal to the Knesset in June.

"We would like to co-operate with this initiative and others by the OSCE," he stated.

Later, Rivlin told The CJN that the Barcelona Process "gave us the opportunity to be part of an initiative" that includes Egypt, Morocco and Algeria.

Ironically, it wasn't the Algerian parliamentarian who was most critical of Israel during the morning Mediterranean session. That distinction fell to a parliamentarian from Greece, who said the origin of the Middle East conflict was the "continued occupation of Palestine by Israel" and of Cyprus by Turkey.

The Algerian parliamentarian was more diplomatic. He voiced his support for the Sarkozy initiative, saying, "I believe the OSCE can make a significant contribution to developing peace and co-operation in the region."

He called the Israel-Arab conflict a continuing "100-year-war… that has lasted too long. We feel it in the other Arab and Muslim countries because our public opinion is… in solidarity with the Palestinians. The media creates a great deal of damage in this area with the images we see on TV [and it] creates rifts in our country and significant rifts in other countries.

"There are political and aggressive errors and errors of violence in this region and this creates disturbances in certain Maghreb [North African] countries and in Muslim countries," the Algerian added.

To make a difference

In To Heal a Fractured World: The Ethics of Social Responsibility (Schocken Books, New York, 2005), British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks eloquently, and even movingly, explains how and why this is so.

"Judaism is a complex and subtle faith," Rabbi Sacks writes. "Yet it has rarely lost touch with its simple ethical imperatives. We are here to make a difference [emphasis added], to mend the fractures of the world, a day at a time, an act at a time, for as long as it takes to make it a place of justice and compassion where the lonely are not alone, the poor are not without help; here, the cry of the vulnerable is heeded, and those who are wronged are heard… The truths of religion are exalted, but its duties are close at hand. We know God less by contemplation than by emulation. The choice is not between faith and deeds, for it is by our deeds that we express our faith and make it real in the life of others and the world."

Indeed, it is especially at this time of year, on the eve of Rosh Hashanah, that we feel the full impact of Rabbi Sacks' insights.

At Rosh Hashanah, we celebrate many theological themes. But one of the key themes that courses throughout the holiday is the unity of the world and the Kingship of the one God Who reigns over all that He has created.

"Hayom harat olam… This day the world was called into being," we recite after each session of the shofar blasts. "Hayom ya'amid bamishpat kol yetsurei olamim… This day all creatures of the universe stand in judgment before You," we continue in reciting.

And as it is obligatory to hear the sounds of the shofar, it is important, too, to recite the proclamation and press deep into our consciousness its profound meaning: that all of God's world is interconnected as a single life-sustaining, and life enhancing system.

Rabbi Sacks refines the point even more sharply.

"We cannot know God, Maimonides implies, but we can act like him [through acts of kindness, righteousness and justice]. Within the limits of human intelligence, we can climb at least part of the way to heaven, but the purpose of the climb is the return to earth [emphasis added], knowing that here is where God wants us to be and where he has given us work to do. Judaism contains mysteries, but its ultimate purpose is not mysterious at all. It is to honour the image of God in other people, and thus turn the world into a home for the Divine presence."

The best, if not the only, way to turn the world into a home for the Divine presence is to care for it and for its inhabitants, to act at all times for its betterment and for the betterment of its inhabitants.

"To live is to give," Rabbi Sacks writes so elegantly.

Let us therefore resolve on the eve of Rosh Hashanah to give of kindness, righteousness and justice to each other for the sake of the other.

This is the world we must build for the sake of our faith and our tradition, for the sake of our children and our grandchildren, and for the sake of the promise we made in our hearts to those whom we once loved but are no more.

Shanah Tovah.

The incoming president of the United Nations General Assembly, Jorge Illueca, vice-president of Panama, called for a Palestinian state under PLO leadership. Kashrut and ethics (1)

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks argues effectively that the Orthodox Union and similar agencies should not be responsible for certifying activities beyond the kashrut of food ("Kashrut agencies shouldn't be leveraging ethics," CJN Toronto; "Kashrut agencies and ethics," CJN Montreal; Sept. 11). If I am to understand the rabbi correctly, the focus of such agencies should remain on certifying foods according to halachic standards, but they should also act appropriately if illegal activities are discovered in the companies they supervise.

In the case of Agriprocessors, the alleged Dickensian working conditions imposed upon its employees have yet to be proven in court. Nonetheless, the descriptions and extent of the alleged abuses have been abhorrent. The perception, in this instance, is that the OU kashrut supervisors, and perhaps the OU itself, turned a blind eye to these conditions. Is this the "appropriate response" that the rabbi suggests?

Rabbi Tradburks makes no reference in his article to any actions taken by the OU supervisors to intervene with the owners of Agriprocessors or notify government authorities of the reported travesties. This apparent inaction on the part of the OU supervisors has led many to conclude that they forsook the treatment of the company's employees either because they didn't care to become involved or to protect the company's owners or both. This is much to the shame of our community, as the OU supervisors and the owners of Agriprocessors deem themselves to be Orthodox and thus supposedly adhere to a strict moral code.

Kashrut is partly about rising to a higher ethical plain in the treatment of animals used for human consumption. The call to widen the scope of what makes food "kosher" may be perilous, as Rabbi Tradburks warns, but let's not be too quick to excuse those charged with both a moral imperative and the inherent regulatory authority who seem to ensure that animals in the kashrut process are cared for humanely but wear blinders when it comes to the treatment of the humans involved.

Kashrut and ethics (2)

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks makes the case that the Orthodox Union should not assume the mandate of supervising the business practices of kosher meat companies, just as it should not be expected to police the entertainment and conduct at functions where kosher products are consumed ("Kashrut agencies shouldn't be leveraging ethics," CJN Toronto; "Kashrut agencies and ethics," CJN Montreal; Sept. 11). Rabbi Tradburks wants "kashrut agencies to supervise kashrut and kashrut alone," and questions why "the issue of ethics has become the responsibility of the OU alone."

This is why. Ethics and kashrut are and have always been interwoven. The laws of kashrut stem from six simple words in the Torah, prohibiting the cooking of a kid in its mother's milk. Commentators for generations have explained the prohibition as grounded in ethics – as demonstrating a respect for the animal by not adding the indignity of cooking it in its mother's milk. One can hardly supervise the ethical standards inherent in the laws of kashrut, while at the same time turning a blind eye to the plight of underpaid Guatemalan and Salvadorean undocumented workers who toiled at the Agriprocessers plant. Agriprocessers hired these workers because it is alleged they were paid a lower wage than a U.S. citizen would expect, with little or no benefits, and no recourse for grievances.

For kashrut supervision to aspire to the highest ethical standard requires a broader perspective than what Rabbi Tradburks envisions. Surely the same respect shown to the animal in the biblical text must also be shown to the worker who processes it. And who better to sound the alarm if workers in faraway Postville, Iowa, are mistreated than the kashrut supervisors who walk through the plant every day. While Rabbi Tradburks places the responsibility of ethical policing upon the consumer, the reality is that until this story broke most Jews had never heard of Agriprocessors or Postville, Iowa – let alone that undocumented workers were alleged to have been exploited there.

Finally, Rabbi Tradburks argues that the OU cannot be expected to police the conduct of those who consume kosher products at Kashruth Council-supervised functions. This deflects the discussion to activities over which the OU clearly has no mandate and away from what had been taking place in a kosher slaughterhouse right within the OU's primary mandate.

Israeli Arabs

I found the column "Israeli Arabs still struggle for equality" (Kirshner File, CJN, Sept. 4) most disturbing. Though citizens, the 20 per cent Muslim or Christian Arabs in Israel are treated as second-class inhabitants. Throughout our history, Jews have been subject to such discrimination, and it is indeed regrettable that in their country, Israel, Jews are the purveyors of such a pernicious practice.

Hopes high as Livni takes the reins of Kadima

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

With her narrow victory in the Kadima Party primary last week, Tzipi Livni's next major task will be to assemble a coalition government so she can become prime minister.

Then all she'll have on her plate is figuring out how to arrest the threat to Israel from Iran, resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict with a historic peace deal, neutralize the threat on Israel's northern border from Hezbollah and run the country.

If she ever gets to it.

The immediate challenge Livni faces is demonstrating – both to the Israeli people and to Kadima's prospective coalition partners – that her 431-vote margin of victory primary is enough for her to assert her leadership and bring partners into a coalition government.

In the early hours of last Thursday morning, Judge Dan Arbel announced that Livni beat the runner-up in the race, Transportation Minister Shaul Mofaz, by a mere 431 votes – 43.1 per cent to Mofaz's 42 per cent, according to Israeli media reports.

Lawyers for Mofaz initially announced he might challenge the results, but Mofaz later called Livni to congratulate her and conceded defeat.

Early exit polling had given Livni a double-digit margin of victory, as reported initially by JTA. But as the votes were counted late into the night, Livni's margin dwindled to about one per cent.

The two other contenders in the primary finished far behind, with Interior Minister Meir Sheetrit winning 8.5 per cent of the vote and Internal Security Minister Avi Dichter garnering 6.5 per cent.

In the vote at 114 polling stations throughout the country, fewer than 33,000 people, or about 54 per cent of Kadima members, voted for a party leader to succeed Prime Minister Ehud Olmert – a relatively low turnout by Israeli standards.

Even so, Livni complained of "congestion" at polling stations and argued for an extension of voting time by an hour. In a compromise, Kadima decided to extend voting by 30 minutes.

Livni's victory is historic in several respects. She won the first-ever primary held by Kadima, the three-year-old political party founded by former prime minister Ariel Sharon. Her election also brings an end to the Olmert era, though he will stay on as caretaker prime minister until a coalition is assembled.

And if she succeeds in cobbling together a coalition, Livni would become Israel's second female prime minister, following Golda Meir.

Livni will have 42 days to form a government. If she fails, Israel will be headed for new general elections.

She has made it clear that she wants to base her new government on the existing coalition – Kadima, Labor, Shas and the Pensioners parties – with the possible addition of other parties such as Avigdor Lieberman's Yisrael Beiteinu on the right, Meretz on the left and the fervently Orthodox Torah Judaism Party.

Livni wants to limit the current transition period, which she sees as a potentially unhealthy period of a two-headed government.

Kadima leaders argue that there already is a functioning government and there's no reason it shouldn't continue its work. They maintain that all the Labor Party asked Kadima to do was change its leader, and now that the party has done that, continuing with the present coalition shouldn't be a problem.

'Mrs. Clean' could herald new era – if she can form a coalition

But Livni's main coalition partners have no intention of giving her an easy ride. Labor argues that a prime minister effectively elected by only 17,000 or so Israelis has no legitimacy and that the Israeli people as a whole should be allowed to have their say in new elections.

Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu agrees. Polls show Likud would win many more than its current share of 12 Knesset seats if new general elections were held, possibly even winning the plurality and catapulting Netanyahu back into the office of prime minister.

Shas is also threatening new elections unless Livni meets its demands for more generous child allowances and a pledge to keep Jerusalem off the negotiating agenda with the Palestinians.

If Livni fails to form a coalition, an election could be held as early as next spring. If she succeeds, she could govern for a year or two before going into a new election with the incumbency advantage.

During the campaign, Livni gave a slew of interviews in which she spelled out her priorities:

• Moving ahead on the Palestinian track: Over the past few months, she and the former Palestinian prime minister, Ahmed Qureia, have been drafting a full-fledged Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement. Both sides say that although they have made progress, closing the wide gaps that still exist will take time.

Once Livni is installed as prime minister, one key issue will become more difficult to resolve: refugees. Livni repeatedly has said that she will not agree to any resettlement in Israel proper of Palestinian refugees, because allowing in just one Palestinian refugee would chip away at Israel's legitimacy as a Jewish state.

Livni might ease conditions on the ground for Palestinians by dismantling illegal settler outposts in the West Bank, something that successive Israeli prime ministers have failed to do. She argues that any government she heads will assert the rule of law.

As for Gaza, Livni warns that she will consider a large-scale ground offensive if Hamas uses the current truce to smuggle in huge quantities of arms.

• Ascertaining the seriousness of the Syrian track: ever since Israel and Syria started conducting new peace feelers under Turkish auspices in January 2007, Livni has not been in the loop. She has argued that by going public with the talks, Israel has provided Syria a degree of international legitimacy without getting very much in return.

Livni will want to see for herself whether Syrian President Bashar Assad is ready for a peace with Israel that entails a significant downgrading of his relations with Iran.

• Dealing quietly with the Iranian nuclear threat: Livni says as far as Israel is concerned, "all options are on the table" and that to say more would be irresponsible. But she has intimated in the past that Israel could live with a nuclear Iran by establishing a very clear deterrent balance.

• Introducing a new style of cleaner government: Livni, who won the leadership race at least partly because of her squeaky clean image, will want to signal early on that she intends to introduce a new style of governing. Livni will want to clean up party politics by breaking the power of the Kadima vote contractors, who drafted people en masse to vote for a particular candidate. One idea is to set a minimum membership period – perhaps 18 months – before party members get voting rights.

By electing Livni, Kadima voters seemed to be saying enough of the generals at the top and enough of wheeler-dealer politics. Livni, dubbed Mrs. Clean, is seen as a straight-thinking, scandal-free civilian clearly out to promote Israel's best interests.

She has a full agenda, a chance to change the tenor of Israel politics and to make historic moves vis-a-vis the Palestinians and Syria.

But first she will have to put together a viable coalition.

Yom Kippur for all

Two of the most accepted criteria for Jewish affiliation in the Diaspora are synagogue membership and financial support for Israeli and communal causes.

Neither means much to the Israelis in our midst. Most wouldn't be seen dead in shul, and philanthropy isn't part of their culture, especially as they feel no allegiance to the community and its institutions. As a result, we blame Israelis for ignoring us, and they complain of being shunned by fellow Jews.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

As reported in this paper, Amir Gissin, Israel's energetic and creative consul general in Toronto, is trying to break the impasse. His appeal to synagogues of all shades to make some gesture to local Israelis during the High Holidays is a first attempt to narrow the gap.

There was a time when Israeli diplomats abroad tended to shun their compatriots. To be a yored – someone who has "come down" from Israel to live in another country – carried a stigma. That's no longer the case. Though Israel still badly needs Jews to "go up," to "make aliyah," to secure its Jewish majority, as an open society, it has learned to accept that some of its citizens will, for a variety of reasons, choose to live elsewhere.

They also know that to isolate them is to further their defection from Judaism, particularly among the young. Though they may still speak Hebrew at home and be in touch with relatives in Israel, perhaps even dreaming of rejoining them there one day, most are likely to stay put and thus are in danger of being lost to the Jewish People.

That's the thinking behind Gissin's idea of adapting the Israeli concept of Yom Kippur Lekulam (Yom Kippur for all).

Even the most secular Israelis connect at least twice a year to some aspect of Jewish tradition. They privately celebrate a version of the seder, and they publicly mark the Day of Atonement, even if only minimally. Gissin's aim is to enable Israelis on the periphery to come together, also with other Jews, on Yom Kippur to observe the day in some form.

Accepting that our synagogue structure doesn't permit unrestricted access to worship services during the High Holidays, Gissin is asking community leaders to make special provisions for Israelis, perhaps before Kol Nidre or during a break on Yom Kippur afternoon, or at some other time. They would thus have an opportunity, however symbolic, to mark the occasion and have intimations of belonging.

A few events are planned for this year, but Gissin's scope is much larger. It's hoped, therefore, that in the future, reaching out to Israelis will become part the High Holiday activities of every congregation. Of course, it's not enough, but we have to start somewhere.

Unity among Jewish organizations

The smell of new textbooks and the sound of fingers clicking on laptop keyboards can mean only one thing: school is back in session, and with that comes a whole slew of new Jewish campus activities at the University of Ottawa and Carleton University.

One fundamental difference in Jewish life on campus is apparent when you walk through downtown Ottawa. This year, you can't walk down the street without seeing a Chabad advertisement.

Chabad president Adam Berktin sent me his personal mission statement about the group: "Chabad on campus is an exciting and lively organization that will assist in the broadening and growth of the Jewish identity of Jewish students on campus, regardless of their level of observance or affiliation. It's a great way to offer Jewish students a way to connect to their Jewish roots. This year, the new Chabad Student Network (CSN) will be providing weekly Shabbos dinners, Jewish study classes, community service activities, guest speakers and so much more. The Chabad shaliach for Ottawa, Rabbi Chaim Boyarksy, alongside his wife, Rebbetzin Yocheved Boyarsky, have previous experience in directing student and community programs and will provide students with a warm, welcoming and stimulating environment."

Justin Dahan in Ottawa

Chabad is a welcome addition to the other two major Jewish groups on campus, Hillel and AEPi.

Hillel, formally known as JSA (Jewish Student Association), looks to "work in conjunction with a lot of different organizations in Ottawa to provide a meaningful experience, and hopefully, provide a home away from home in a Jewish setting," Hillel president Mark Friedman said.

The Ottawa chapter of the Jewish fraternity Alpha Epsilon Pi has students from Ottawa U, Carleton and Algonquin College. Since AEPi reaches out to three different schools, they promote events on all three campuses. Last year AEPi's claim to fame was a security fence demonstration protesting the anti-Israeli sentiments that echoed across Canadian University campuses.

"We're always looking to support the Jewish community. We got a taste of setting up an Israel awareness activity last year on Carleton's campus with our security fence, and we would love to continue our active role in philanthropy with more Israel and Holocaust awareness demonstrations," said Jon Telch, president of the AEPi Ottawa chapter.

Telch went on to talk about the importance of the working relationship between Jewish groups: "It's always important for Jewish organizations to work together. Hillel and Chabad are supportive of AEPi and we like to be supportive of them as well."

Friedman echoed Telch's sentiments: "It's important that we stand together and work together to promote our Jewish values on campus and in Canada," he said

Berktin also "looks forward to working alongside Hillel, AEPi, JET [Jewish Education through Torah] and other Jewish organizations in Ottawa." He hopes to "create a vibrant atmosphere for the Jewish students of Ottawa."

What sets Jews apart is how united we are. It's the pack mentality that has allowed us to rebound from the trials and tribulations that have plagued the Jewish people throughout history.

Chabad, Hillel and AEPi are perfect examples of how, regardless of what type of Jew you are – religious, secular, or whatever – a Jew is a Jew and we should stick together. The Jewish organizations have set the foundation for us to continue the great tradition of unity. They provide Ottawa with sources of Jewish pride, and in their own way, they provide Ottawa with great Jewish programming.

But perhaps the one aspect we tend to overlook is the example these unique groups set in the way they interact with each other. It is these intangibles that may be the most beneficial to the Ottawa Jewish community and we can only hope they continue.

Let's hope 5769 is a year of peace

The coming of the New Year in Judaism means burgeoning new beginnings.

The way we meet the New Year, though, is not something to be taken lightly. It's the unique product of self reflection and contemplation about the year gone by and about the year ahead.

Considering the time of year, it would be very fitting for me to write about my return to Halifax for my fourth and, if everything goes well, final year in university. Along the same lines, I could talk about the lessons I've learned in my previous years and my goals for the upcoming one. I could discuss the city I've come to call home and welcome new students into the community. I could assuage parents' fears and mull over the wide gamut of opportunities students here have for a decent home-cooked Jewish meal – from the annual Jew-BQ and the Smoked Meat Lunch hosted by the Jewish Student Association to the Chabad dinners now being held in a new house near campus.

I could write about all of these things, but I'm not.

Rosh Hashanah, for nations as much as for individuals, gives us a blank slate for reflection. As such, it necessitates the same level of commitment to ruminate on civic and political issues as it does on personal ones. It pushes us to learn from past mistakes and to set goals for the future.

Jesse Mintz in Halifax

For those of you keeping count, this will mark my seventh article on the prospects for Mideast peace.

Jerusalem has existed, and will continue to exist, in the memories of the three great western traditions – as much as an idea as a physical reality. Worshippers, Crusaders and devotees of all three traditions have flocked to a city that serves as a microcosm for the collision of western and eastern, secular and religious, and Jewish, Muslim and Christian. A city so defined by the confluence of differences would seem to have little hope of escaping conflict.

Perhaps I'm a little naïve. Perhaps the near-constant Obama ads calling for change have affected my outlook. Or maybe there has been a palpable shift in the air of late concerning the state of the Mideast conflict.

I'm not predicting an end to hostilities soon. I'm not claiming that all wrongs will be undone. And I'm not hailing a new era of peace. But if you look back at the year that was, and if you look ahead at the year to come, this Rosh Hashanah seems to be welcoming in a new beginning for Israel as well as for us.

To begin with, I am filled with both pride and shame when it comes to our little nation. That its prime minister was compelled – not by revolution or the machinations of a rival party, but by the successes of its open and free media and its law enforcement agencies – to resign due to moral corruption is truly a bittersweet moment for Israeli democracy.

While Ehud Olmert's time at the helm of Israeli politics has finally run its course – and not a moment too soon – the Israeli government under him has recognized that the Greater Israel vision – the obsession of right-wing and religious Zionists alike – has also played itself out. Olmert's comments on the need for pragmatism in land negotiations came amid talks with the Palestinian Authority and indirect peace negotiations with Syria. If this stance is emulated by his successors, it will only serve to further the cause of peace.

While Olmert's vision may not amount to much, his government has put forth an evacuation and compensation bill to assist settlers to relocate to the Israeli side of the Green Line, thus fulfilling the government's duty both to its people and to international law.

Lastly, the near-constant complaint that has time and again derailed peace negotiations before they have even begun – namely, that Israel lacks a real partner for peace – is no longer viable. For better or worse, the people of Gaza elected a Hamas government to lead them, and any plausible future peace will be brokered only through the peoples' representatives, both Palestinian and Israeli.

As much as this time of year is about tashlich, the sounds of the shofar and new beginnings, it should also be a time of renewed effort to make 5769 a year of peace.

The Kirshner File

Selections from Toronto's film festival

As usual, the Toronto International Film Festival, one of the premiere events on the cinematic calendar, presented several films of Jewish interest. This year, the focus was on documentaries, and the topics ran the gamut from the Kasztner affair during the Holocaust to the lives of Jews in Baghdad before and after the Six Day War.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Joe Balass, a Montreal filmmaker born in Baghdad in 1966, has few personal memories of Iraq, since he and his parents escaped when he was four years old. But in Baghdad Twist, a 33-minute National Film Board of Canada production, he looks back at his family's past in Iraq through the media of an extended interview with his mother, family photographs, home movies and archival images.

He thereby produces a film that is by turns nostalgic, haunting and terrifying.

The recurring image in Baghdad Twist is a dimly lit dance floor at a wedding reception in the mid-1960s, where smiling, formally dressed middle-aged couples enjoy themselves. Judging by the vibes this harmless image conveys, one can't begin to imagine that Baghdad's venerable Jewish community was on its last legs. Certainly, the scene captured on Super-8 film took place before Saddam Hussein and company seized control of Iraq, which had been home to Jews since the Babylonian period.

Baghdad Twist begins as Balass' mother remembers the city of her youth, the house by the river in which she was raised and the boiling hot summer months she endured. "Those were the days," she exults as old photographs of her and her husband in their bloom appear on the screen.

Not much times elapses before she discusses the precipitous decline of the community in the wake of the first Arab-Israeli war, in which Iraq participated.

"We started not to be comfortable," she observes, saying that Jews took to remaining inconspicuous.

As the political climate in Iraq worsened, Jews emigrated. Among those who departed were Balass' maternal grandparents. Their departure, shortly after his mother's marriage, did not have much of an effect on his self-confident mother. "I was young and didn't think about that," she says. "I didn't make a big deal out of it."

She describes the early 1960s as a "nice, calm" era. "I was Iraqi, a Jewish Iraqi, and that was it," she says, savouring the memory of a milkman who milked his cow at her doorstep.

But in the aftermath of the Six Day War, in which Iraq also took part, everything changed. Iraqis who had Jewish friends suddenly turned cool and distant. "Arabs started to hate us," she laments. Radio stations urged Iraqis to spy on their Jewish neighbours. "We were scared to death," she admits. Balass' paternal grandfather was arrested and imprisoned three times, accused of transferring funds to Israel.

The public hanging of Jews in Baghdad, to the chants and cheers of thousands of bystanders, was the last straw for Balass' parents. As his mother puts it, ""If we stay, we are dead. If we leave, maybe we'll survive. I don't know." They depart in a hurry, food still in their fridge, and a chapter in the history of the Diaspora ends on a sombre note. Balass, to his credit, distils the essence of that atmosphere succinctly and competently.

Adam Resurrected, directed by Paul Schrader and starring Jeff Goldblum as a German Holocaust survivor who finds his way to Israel in the 1950s, is a graphic but unsatisfying film about the terror and humiliation of persecution and the redemptive powers of laughter and hope.

Baghdad Jews in the mid-1960s, before the political storm

Adapted from a novel by Yoram Kaniuk, Adam Resurrected is set in prewar and postwar Germany and in Israel.

The opening sequence, taking place in a small Tel Aviv hotel in 1961, introduces us to Adam Stein (Goldblum), a cabaret comedian and circus performer who was once dubbed "the funniest man in Germany." Stein, after apparently trying to kill a woman, is escorted by two gentle attendants to a waiting car and returned to a mental institution in the desert for Holocaust survivors.

Rudolf Rezso Israel Kasztner

The film, whose expressionist cinematography captures the blinding landscape of a desert and the misty darkness of a concentration camp, shifts back and forth between the present and the past as Stein's journey from mirth to horror unfolds. In scenes from Berlin, circa 1926 and 1936, Stein shows off his mettle as an entertainer. Even Nazis in the audience are amused by his wicked sense of humour. But as Germany is Nazified, Stein stands on the precipice. Told one night by stormtroopers that, as a Jew, he has no place in the new Germany, Stein, rather naively, protests. "I'm not political," he bleats out, not realizing that his days are numbered in Berlin.

In a further flashback, following Stein's trip back to the sanitarium in Israel, he disembarks from a train, barking dogs at his heels in a bleak concentration camp. The sarcastic German commandant, Klein (Willem Dafoe), recognizes Stein and adopts him as his personal entertainer. On his orders, Stein gets down on all fours and acts like a dog. Later, at the institute in Israel, Stein heals a young man who has been brutalized and can only communicate through barks.

The movie, which also stars the Israeli actress Ayelet Zurer as an empathetic nurse, is bathed in a surreal, almost otherwordly aura, making it virtually impossible for a viewer to identify with its passions. Goldblum delivers a strong performance as a survivor who seeks to overcome his trauma, but Adam Resurrected is hardly the stuff of high, riveting drama.

Killing Kasztner, by Gaylen Ross, is a clinical, blow-by-blow account of the Kasztner affair, one of the most intriguing and still controversial episodes in the annals of the Holocaust. The person at its beating heart, Rudolf Rezso Israel Kasztner, was a Jewish lawyer, journalist and Zionist activist based in Budapest who headed an outfit known as the Aid and Rescue Committee during the Nazi occupation of Hungary. His claim to fame or infamy, depending on one's interpretation, rests on two related developments. Kasztner conducted negotiations with Adolf Eichmann and his colleagues in 1944 to save imperilled Hungarian Jews from the gas chambers. In exchange for a handsome ransom, he also facilitated the departure of more than 1,600 Jews on a special train to neutral Switzerland via the Bergen-Belsen camp.

After the war, Kasztner and his family immigrated to Israel. In 1953, while employed by the Israeli government, he was accused of having been a Nazi collaborator. There was a libel trial, during which the judge ruled that Kasztner had "sold his soul to the devil." The Supreme Court overturned much of that lower court ruling, but the die was cast. In 1957, a young right-wing radical named Zeev Eckstein assassinated him, adding a fresh and unnerving layer to an already convoluted case. Ross' absorbing documentary – which implicitly portrays Kasztner in a sympathetic light and raises disquieting issues about his trial and death – features testimony from Eckstein, Kasztner's articulate daughter Zsuzi, her three daughters, the son of the lawyer who prosecuted Kasztner and the publisher who made hay out of the trial.

The Heart of Jenin, by Leon Geller and Marcus Vetter, recounts the story of a Palestinian father from the West Bank who donated the organs of his 12-year-old son, shot by an Israeli soldier, to five Israelis, including a girl from a haredi family in Jerusalem. This impassioned film, breathing humanity and exuding sorrow, underscores the yawning gap between Israelis and Palestinians, even as they are both in a state of mourning.

A one and 100 birthday party

By HAILEY EISEN
Special to The CJN

When she first heard that her due date would fall on Aug. 26, 2007, Rachel Weinstein couldn't help but hope that her first child would be born on her grandmother's 99th birthday.

The idea for the "one and 100" birthday party that she threw earlier this month for her daughter and grandmother actually came to her before baby Miriam was even born.

"When I was pregnant, I would joke with my grandmother that she would be able to celebrate her 100th birthday in conjunction with her great-granddaughter's first," Weinstein said. "I am so glad that I was able to make this happen."

For Anne Kay, who has four great-grandchildren and eight grandchildren, there is a unique connection with Miriam, her youngest great-grandchild.

This is a result both of their shared birthday and the fact they represent two pillars of a century-long family lineage.

While Kay is able to comprehend everything going on around her and adores interaction, her ability to communicate has become somewhat limited over the past few years. Her favourite times are spent listening to stories told to her by family and friends. That, too, is something she shares with her one-year-old great-granddaughter.

"They communicate through touch, mostly," said Weinstein, who works as an executive coach in Toronto. "Miriam honks my grandmother's nose, and they both laugh. She touches her face and hands and feet, and that's how they connect."

At the birthday party, which was held in Weinstein's backyard on a sunny day in early September, a large group of relatives and friends took the opportunity to toast this momentous simchah – one that many families never have the opportunity to experience.

"I truly hope my daughter gets to celebrate 100 healthy, happy years and share the story of this occasion with her great-grandchildren one day," Weinstein said in her toast. "This is so much bigger than just a party. It's the opportunity to possibly connect seven or eight generations."

Because Weinstein had such a great sense of family growing up, she feels that it's important to share this with her daughter.

She recalled her father encouraging her to memorize her grandmother's phone number in order to foster a close relationship.

"My dad is really the link that has connected all four generations," Weinstein said. "He visits his mother in Baycrest on a daily basis and is at my house a few times a week playing with Miriam."

As an adult, Weinstein remains very close with her grandmother as well. Her frequent visits are spent sharing the details of her life, from weddings she's attended to what she's cooking for Shabbat dinner, as well as reminiscing about years past.

"When I was in my first year of university, my grandmother would send me weekly packages in the mail," Weinstein recalled. Inside these envelopes would be articles, letters, and cutout pictures from catalogues and magazines.

"She would ask me if this pair of shoes was in style or what I thought about that particular article."

Weinstein now sees much of her grandmother in Miriam.

"Especially when she laughs, she reminds me of my grandmother," Weinstein said. "It's not just a chuckle for show, but a real, heartfelt laugh."

When asked if she had any advice to give Miriam on her first birthday, Kay replied that she hopes only for her great-granddaughter to be a mensch and an honest person.

"I wish her good health and I wish that she grows up to become a real young lady."

Although Kay is now almost completely blind, Weinstein was able to provide her with descriptions of everyone who came to celebrate her special occasion.

"I think she's a bit overwhelmed by the idea of turning 100," Weinstein said. "She just keeps saying, 'It's too much.'"

But it's certainly not too much for her family.

"I just think it's so amazing that Miriam is able to have this relationship with her great-grandmother," Weinstein said. "It's something she'll be able to carry with her for her entire life."

One of the world's most fabulous skylines.

Oz says Mideast peace 'means partition of the land'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The vast majority of Israelis and Palestinians are ready for "a compromise solution" to the Arab-Israeli conflict, says Israeli novelist and journalist Amos Oz.

"Compromise means the partition of the land, which is painful but necessary," said Oz, delivering the first Gerald Schwartz Heather Reisman lecture of the season at Holy Blossom Temple last week. "There is simply no alternative."

Oz, who has long favoured a two-state solution to resolve Israel's struggle with the Palestinians, described the conflict as a "real estate dispute" rather than as a "holy war."

One of Israel's most distinguished writers and a founder of Peace Now, Oz claimed there is no "essential misunderstanding" between Israelis and the Palestinians, because both want and need a land of their own.

"What's needed is a livable compromise," he said, noting that Israelis and Palestinians are weary of fighting each other. "Many conflicts have been resolved due to fatigue and exhaustion, and that leads to compromise."

In his vocabulary, compromise is synonymous with life, while the alternative leads to death.

He added, "I know something about compromise, having been married to the same woman for 49 years."

Most Israelis and Palestinians already roughly know what a peace accord would entail, said Oz, whose novels have been translated into some 30 languages.

An agreement should be based on Israel's 1967 borders, with mutual territorial swaps to allow Israel to retain some settlements in the West Bank.

Palestinian refugees would be resettled in a Palestinian entity and not in Israel, and western and eastern Jerusalem would respectively serve as the capital of each state.

"One day, there will be an Palestinian embassy in Israel and an Israeli embassy in Palestine, both within walking distance of each other," he predicted.

Neither Israel nor Palestine would claim sovereignty over Jerusalem's holy places, but Israelis and Palestinians would have free access to them.

Arguing that Israel and the Palestinians have no alternative but to terminate the conflict, Oz noted that fanatics on both sides will try to derail a possible agreement.

In a dire warning, Oz said that if Israel persists in occupying the West Bank, the Palestinians there will demand voting rights, with the international community supporting them, and this would signify "the end of Israel."

Calling Israel's conflict with the Palestinians tragic, Oz said that Jews and Palestinians have been victimized by European oppression.

Jews were the object of anti-Semitic persecution, while Palestinians were subjected to western colonialism.

Yet Arabs regard Israeli Jews as colonialists instead of former refugees from European anti-Semitism, while Jews see Arabs and Palestinian as latter-day Cossack oppressors rather than as "fellow victims."

Oz, whose topic was "Telling the Zionist Story Anew: Israel Explains Itself to the World," said the Jewish state was born out of "mutually exclusive dreams and master plans."

Some Jews wanted to build a capitalist or a Marxist state, while still others dreamed of building a super shtetl or a social democratic welfare state in Israel.

Oz admitted he dislikes some of these master plans, but is glad that Israel is a pluralistic marketplace of competing visions.

Taking a swipe at the "distorted perspectives" of the mass media, Oz talked about the "huge difference" between the "real" Israel and the Israel portrayed by the CNN cable news network.

On CNN, undue emphasis is placed on depicting Israel as a nation dominated by fanatic Jewish settlers and gun-toting soldiers manning checkpoints restricting the movement of Palestinians.

In CNN news reports, Israel is also seen through the filter of Jerusalem.

But in the "real" Israel, a country with "painful pockets of poverty," 70 per cent of its inhabitants – a pushy, generous, noisy and energetic people, in Oz's characterization – live on the Mediterranean coastal plain.

In a reference to his parents and grandparents, whose country of origin was Poland, Oz said that the only true Europeans in the 1920s and 1930s were Jews like them.

Rather than considering themselves Poles or Lithuanians, Jews saw themselves as Europeans. They loved the culture, music and landscape, but Europe didn't "like them back," perceiving them as rootless cosmopolitans and marginalizing them through anti-Semitism.

So unbearable was the anti-Semitism that they left Europe, bound for Palestine after being rejected by other countries.

The Land of Israel was thus a "life boat" for European Jewish immigrants.

Describing contemporary Israel as "an assemblage of screaming voices," Oz said that Israeli society is open, democratic and argumentative.

"We're a nation of seven million prophets," he mused, savouring his words.

But if Israel is to prosper, he said, it must resolve its conflict with the Arabs and eradicate poverty.

Conservative movement leaders gather in Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Bradley Shavit Artson says he loves that Conservative Judaism is "a diverse, raucous, big tent."

The dean of the Ziegler School of Rabbinic Studies at the American Jewish University (formerly the University of Judaism) in Los Angeles was in Toronto last week to join fellow senior leaders of the Conservative movement, Rabbi Jerome Epstein, executive vice-president of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ – the umbrella for about 700 Conservative synagogues in North America), and Rabbi Joel Meyers, executive vice-president of the movement's Rabbinical Assembly, on a panel to discuss "Why I am Conservative Jew."

The event, held Sept. 15 at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, was organized by the USCJ's Canadian region.

Until the question-and-answer session, the panelists did not directly address recent issues in the Conservative movement in Toronto, where three of its largest synagogues – Adath Israel Congregation, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and Beth Tzedec Congregation – ended their affiliations with the USCJ earlier this year following 15 months of negotiations between congregational representatives and the New York-based USCJ.

The main issue was value received for USCJ membership dollars, but ideological differences between more traditional congregations here and liberal elements in the movement have become increasingly apparent in the last few years over issues such as egalitarianism and ordination of openly gay rabbinical students.

In response to a question about the possibility of creating a "Masorti community" in Canada similar to ones that exist in South America, Israel and Europe, Rabbi Artson said, in part, that "it is always easier to fix what you've got than to invent something, as though nothing was already on the ground.

"The vitality of Canada is important to the movement as a whole," he said. "Don't walk away from an outstretched hand. Take it. Grasp it, and then let's educate each other about what we need from each other so we can be our best."

Rabbi Meyers said that he and his colleagues recognize that Canada has its own culture and that it is not the United States.

"Our job is not to flatten each other into mirror images of ourselves," said Rabbi Artson during his address, referring to Conservative Jewish communities in Los Angeles and Uganda.

"I assume there are certain parallels between Judaism as practised in Los Angeles and Judaism as practised in Toronto," he continued. "My job is not to tell you that L.A. Judaism is better. My job is to understand the needs and the dynamics of your community well enough so that I can help you become great, authentic, true to the path of Torah as your community needs to walk it."

At the Ziegler school, he noted, there are egalitarian and non-egalitarian students.

"We don't just argue about trivia. We argue about big, important things," said Rabbi Artson, referring to the Conservative movement as a whole. "That's what family is. There's no ideological litmus test to be in a family. You're just family, and we need to model that in the world."

Rabbi Meyers said that Conservative Judaism has taught him "that Judaism is an evolving religious civilization… It's a traditional Judaism which possesses a willingness nevertheless to examine tradition and to refine and even amend it, something very difficult but very necessary."

As well, he said that the denomination is halachic, Zionist, and committed both to learning and to caring for the greater society. It is "an especially authentic way of being Jewish."

Rabbi Epstein, who grew up in the Conservative movement, said that he is a Conservative Jew in large part because his parents were, and also because of his experiences in United Synagogue Youth (the denomination's youth movement, commonly known as USY), and at Camp Ramah.

He said that after high school, however, he was "intrigued by the lack of boundaries of Reform Judaism, and at other times I was engaged by the firm boundaries of Orthodoxy.

"But ultimately I decided that Conservative Judaism spoke most eloquently to me because of its values around Jewish living, around Halachah, and around mitzvot."

Although he said there is "a wide spectrum of diversity in Conservative synagogues, and many do not yet practise what we preach and stand for," Rabbi Epstein asked rhetorically what would be accomplished by demanding 100 per cent observance.

Israel expects record tourism year in 2008

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Israeli travel industry continues to show strong growth, with 2008 proving to be a record year, according to Oren Drori, deputy director of the country's Ministry of Tourism.

Close to three million travellers are expected to visit the Jewish state by the end of 2008, even more than the ministry's pre-year forecast of 2.8 million, Drori said last week at a news conference at the Israeli consulate. Canadians are expected to comprise 75,000 of those visitors (up from 61,000 in 2007), another record and a remarkable figure given the country's distance from Israel and its relatively small population, he said.

Drori, Oded Grofman, tourism consul and director of the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO), and Jerry Adler, manager of marketing and public relations for the IGTO, delivered the upbeat assessment to writers from the travel industry and Jewish press.

The actual number of travellers originating from Canada might be even higher than the 75,000, Adler said, as an estimated 15 to 20 per cent are believed to use Israeli or European travel documents. Canadian spend an average of 10 days in Israel – more than other groups – and spend $1,368 during their stays, said Grofman.

The United States is the single largest source of visitors to the Jewish state, with more than 700,000 expected in 2008. France is second with 300,000, followed by Russia, Germany and Britain. Russia is a rapidly growing market, and the Tourism Ministry expects as many as 400,000 Russians per year will soon visit Israel, given its relatively short distance from Russia and Israel's decision to drop a visa requirement, Drori said.

Israel's economy has benefitted from the surge in tourists, Drori continued. Tourism represents close to six per cent of the country's GDP, and as many as 130,000 people are directly employed in the industry.

The Tourism Ministry has set a goal of growing the numbers of visitors to five million within the next four or five years. "We are confident we can achieve it," Drori said.

He attributed the record numbers to the relative "calm" in Israel, with fewer negative media portrayals than in the past years. Other factors are the desire of sophisticated travellers to explore new destinations and the country's improved marketing.

The ministry embarked on a new strategy in June 2007 to concentrate its marketing efforts and devote the resources to promote Israel in the North American market, he said. One million dollars was invested in the Canadian market alone, said Drori.

While the "bread and butter" clientele remains the Jewish community and the Christian evangelical market, the ministry has also attempted to make Israel attractive to other groups. Israel is being "re-branded as a regular, even a trendy, destination," he said, noting the New York Times had played up that aspect in a recent article on Tel Aviv.

The marketing effort has been concentrated in New York, southern California and south Florida and "it has shown results," Drori said.

In the last year, more than 20 North American travel companies that don't necessarily cater to a Jewish or evangelical clientele have made Israel travel "a shelf product" – something they regularly offer to customers.

Grofman said similar developments have taken place in Toronto, where ads placed in Metro (Toronto), the Globe and Mail, and the Edmonton Sun have paid dividends. Charming Holidays, which serves the Chinese community, has pushed Israel as a destination.

The Tourism Ministry's marketing campaign has featured real-life Israelis, such as dancers and even a cowboy, in front of cityscapes or in a rural setting, along with a short story describing their lives. The tag line for the Jewish market is, "You'll love Israel from the first shalom," while for others it is, "Visit Israel, you'll never be the same."

Drori said the ministry's followup surveys show that the marketing campaign has proven effective in portraying Israel as a "surprising, different" destination, without "losing the human touch."

Children's author writes 'educational poems'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

From the "OI" (pronounced "oy") "Opinions and Insights" notebooks her students write in every day to the English translation of When the Shark and the Fish First Met, a story written by kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit, Noa Schwartz likes to bring Jewish elements into her classes at United Synagogue Day School's Beth Tikvah campus.

A Grade 3 and 4 general studies teacher, Schwartz has also used Israel-related YouTube videos as springboards for lessons on media literacy.

"The curriculum tells you what [students] need to do, but not [what] the conduit [should be]. The conduit can be Judaism," she said in an interview last week.

Schwartz' Jewish identity was shaped in part by attending Jewish day school – the Hamilton Hebrew Academy – as well as at Camp Ramah and in her high school, where she was the only Jewish student. She was an observant Conservative Jew who kept kosher, attended Hamilton's Beth Jacob Synagogue every Shabbat, and taught Hebrew school.

A lesson from the teacher: Schwartz is fond of philosophical quotes. Among her favourites are: "Change your thoughts, and you can change your world," and "Keep your eyes on the horizon, and all else will follow."

A native of Israel whose parents had made aliyah from Canada, Schwartz, now 36, returned with them to this country when she was only eight months old.

Before beginning her bachelor of education studies at York University, Schwartz studied sociology at the University of Western Ontario from 1990 to 1993.

As an undergraduate, she served as a BBYO adviser, an experience that influenced her career choice.

After she began teaching 13 years ago at USDS' Beth Tzedec branch, Schwartz earned an M.Ed. from the University of Toronto. She worked at USDS' southern branch for 10 years, teaching Jewish studies and running student council.

Although Schwartz, who is married with two young daughters, was not looking to work in a Jewish school per se when she graduated, she feels she lives a "blessed life." As things turned out, she said, "I get to be all of who I am."

One aspect of her teaching involves writing "educational poems" for her students on topics such as Jewish holidays, and Canadian history and geography.

A published author with two children's books to her credit – Crazy for Canada and Old Timers – The One That Got Away, a book about Alzheimer's disease – Schwartz said that her poems "become the backdrop, and what comes to the forefront is the knowledge part. It's like a mnemonic."

As a teacher, she said, she has high standards and high expectations. "I like to be firm but fair, funny but not frivolous."

Teachers, more than anyone, are inclined to be learners, Schwartz believes. "It's incredible to be part of it… In today's data-driven world, we have to constantly be learning and growing."

Even after 13 years at the same school, Schwartz remains enthused about her job. "I get very excited," she said. "I really do like what I do."

Schwartz, who has run workshops for teachers on helping empower students by giving them a variety of leadership opportunities, said that a leader can come from anywhere, and that, sometimes, children's skills don't present themselves unless they are given the right opportunity.

Constantly aware of her "teacherness," Schwartz feels she is a better person because of it. "I give more to tzedakah, and I can't go through a stop sign because God forbid a student should ever see me. It's something I take so seriously… I would never want my students to be negatively affected."

'Lots of talent' in Wagman Centre's art room

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The art room at the Joseph and Minnie Wagman Centre is a beehive of creative activity, where members do ceramics, stained glass, painting, sewing and other crafts.

The queen bee of this atelier is Rachel Aronov, 88, a volunteer and member who has been teaching ceramics at the Wagman Centre for almost 25 years.

The Bulgarian-born Aronov studied ceramics in Sofia. She also ran a ceramics factory in Israel for 25 years before joining her son in Canada. A serious car accident in 1984 led to her admission to Baycrest Hospital.

Through the hospital, she became connected to the creative arts studio at the Wagman Centre. Pointing to her seat, she says with a smile. "I have been sitting in the same chair for 25 years."

A Baycrest Terrace resident for the past 16 years, Aronov is at the art centre every day that it's open.

She says she helps five to 10 people a day with ceramic painting. "I have discovered lots of talent."

And there is no shortage of appreciative students and admirers, according to Adrienne Glaun, an arts centre regular who prefers to keep her age a secret.

"Rachel has made ceramics my life," Glaun says. "She has helped me make the most wonderful things."

The mood is jovial at the ceramics table where Ted Rosen, 91, a retired psychiatrist, decorates a ceramic bowl with a floral design. "Rachel is the teacher," he says. "I'm colour blind. I rely on her."

Rosen also does fabric art, bead making and wood burning. A natural kibbitzer, he happily models some scarves and beads he's made in the art centre before he heads off to a discussion group.

Rachel Aronov, left, Ted Rosen and Irina Iordanova

The warm atmosphere of the art studio draws many participants, says Irina Iordanova, creative arts co-ordinator for the Wagman Centre and Baycrest Terrace.

She says the community in the art room has created a "family environment, where people are supportive of one another. They all help each other out."

Iordanova says she tries to foster a community spirit by celebrating holidays and birthdays. "We listen to music, and we do dancing. We try to incorporate all different art forms in the daily activities of the art room."

The art centre must accommodate various levels of physical, cognitive and social ability, she notes, explaining that some people can work independently, while others have serious physical and cognitive challenges.

She says that her background in art, physiotherapy and bio-psychosocial studies enables her to devise activities for people of various abilities.

For example, Iordanova notes that because people with Parkinson's disease have trouble holding a paint brush, she has them do ceramics by scratching a design onto the painted surface.

Coincidentally, Iordanova, who is Bulgarian, graduated from the same art college as Aronov.

"I couldn't believe that she went to the same college," Aronov says. "There's lots of sharing[between us]. We have a good understanding. "We're good friends, and we're good partners. Irina has taught us all."

Wide diversity found in movement

His own synagogue, years earlier, helped him understand "what I had to do [to grow in observance] not by dictate but by patient teaching," he said.

He noted that there is room for improvement in terms of integrating young people who want to replicate Camp Ramah or USY experiences in their synagogues.

There are resource people and material available to help congregations become more welcoming, he told the audience of some 250 people.

However, he added, congregations must be willing to change.

Rabbi Philip Scheim, who moderated the discussion, asked whether there are limits to pluralism, and what those limits are.

Rabbi Artson said that "any decisions we make are made through the filter of Torah."

One hundred years from now, he noted, our descendants will have that responsibility.

He said there are also "emotional limits" among Conservative Jews, who tend to be small-c conservatives.

"By and large, our movement likes retaining the tradition as traditionally as possible for as long as possible."

Aside from "sex and gender" issues, Rabbi Artson said, there's "overwhelming consensus" on halachic issues.

Anti-Israel Facebook groups infiltrated

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Opponents of the State of Israel have been staking a place for themselves in cyberspace for some time, using the Internet to vilify the Jewish state and glorify terrorism, but a Jewish organization has joined battle with them by employing a favourite tactic of the left – direct action.

A group calling itself the Jewish Internet Defense Force (JIDF) has taken control of an Arabic-language Facebook group which set a goal of finding one million people who hate Israel within 90 days. The JIDF deleted more than 55,000 group members.

Another Facebook group, "Eliminate Israel from Being," saw more than 5,000 members deleted after JIDF "took it over." Facebook later returned control of the site to its administrators.

JIDF, which claims 5,000 members worldwide, took the action after it said Facebook staff ignored requests to remove the groups, which had published content the JIDF said violated Facebook's own terms of service.

"The JIDF was concerned with the proliferation of hatred and the promotion of Islamic terrorism within Facebook," stated an e-mail reply to CJN questions. "Our early attempts to intervene involved the creation of groups that listed these hate groups. The JIDF pointed Facebook staff to these groups and asked them to take action. In some cases they did. In many, they did not, or the progress was taking many months, allowing the hate material to circulate.

"Eventually the JIDF responded and took matters into our own hands, since Facebook seemed disinclined to take the needed action," stated the e-mail from a group representative who gave his name only as "David."

JIDF claims that some clients on Facebook, a social networking website, spread anti-Semitic conspiracy theories, demonize Zionists, praise attacks on Israeli or Jewish civilians, promote violence, hatred and Islamic jihadist propaganda, recruit people to Islamic terrorist organizations and support white supremacy and Nazi groups.

Scanning the pages highlighted by the JIDF revealed in short order the offering of the Protocols of Zion, a notorious anti-Semitic forgery that alleged Jews controlled governments and media, on the Eliminate Israel Facebook page.

A posting by a member of the "Israel is not a country" page advocated another Holocaust: "wat do u think only arabs will come 2 bust ur ass? i guess u all r mistaken cuz time will come not only the arabs the whole muslim world will come 2 bust ur ass and each and every jew will be eradicated from the surface of the earth and that day will be the day off armageddon [sic]."

Another group publicized by JIDF, "Based on the facts.... there was no Holocaust," cites neo-Nazi propaganda located on the website of Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel.

A Facebook spokesperson responded to queries from the CJN with an e-mail that stated, "Facebook carefully reviews the notices we receive regarding groups that may violate our Terms of Use (ToU). In this particular case, the 'How Many People Hate Israel' group [one of four The CJN asked Facebook to comment on] does not violate our ToU, because the group attacks Israel and Zionism, not Israelis or Jews. As stated in our ToU, we make a clear distinction between countries or ideas and people: groups that express views on a particular country or idea are permitted, while groups that explicitly threaten people are regarded as a violation of our ToU and are subsequently taken down. Our ToU also stipulate that we do not allow recognized terrorist organizations on the site."

The JIDF was created in reaction to the Palestinian intifadah eight years ago, "as a collective of individual activists." It has operated under the name JIDF since the massacre earlier this year at the Mercaz HaRav Yeshiva in Jerusalem. It operated as an independent, unaffiliated organization that relies on volunteers and individual donors, David stated.

Its political views place it on the Zionist right. It has taken positions against the 2005 withdrawal from Gaza and it launched an e-mail campaign after the second intifadah began in 2000 against rewarding terrorism with territorial concessions.

After the yeshiva massacre in Jerusalem, Facebook groups "went up to honour the massacre," David stated. That prompted the shift in JIDF tactics to direct action, away from an earlier "soft approach" of e-mail campaigns to convince Facebook and other sites to regulate their cyberspace content.

Facebook's terms of use state, in part, that the site cannot be used to, "upload, post, transmit, share, store or otherwise make available any content that we deem to be harmful, threatening, unlawful, defamatory, infringing, abusive, inflammatory, harassing, vulgar, obscene, fraudulent, invasive of privacy or publicity rights, hateful, or racially, ethnically or otherwise objectionable."

Facebook's spokesperson said, "We rely on more than 100 million vigilant users to help us ensure that groups comply with our ToU. Users can report any group that may be in violation of Facebook's ToU by clicking on the link at the bottom of the group's page. Facebook reviews these reports and takes actions as necessary."

Makom: Bringing the real Israel to Toronto

By Daniel Horowitz

Thanks to two articulate and passionate 18-year-old girls from Eilat, Jewish youth at Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple and Leo Baeck Day School have been receiving up-close and personal lessons about the "real" Israel in a fun environment for the past year.

And the program, called Makom, proved so successful in its first year, it has expanded this year.

In August 2007, the Israeli natives, Hilly Baar Noy and Rosy Meshi – both of whom chose to volunteer an additional year before beginning their army service - arrived in Toronto to begin their roles as young emissaries, charged with the task of helping Jewish youth connect with their synagogues and schools, with Israel serving as the unifying force.

Makom, chaired by long-time UJA leader Michael Diamond, began to take shape in Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple before expanding to include Leo Baeck, the Israeli Scouts and Camp George.

UJA Federation is a member of Makom – the Israel Engagement Network – a partnership of Jewish communities and the Jewish Agency for Israel.

The program was designed to develop unique and innovative approaches to provide Diaspora Jews with an insider's perspective of Israel.

"Simply put, Makom exists to encourage the North American Diaspora to keep Israel in their consciousness; to see Israel as being part of their experience of being Jewish and being part of the Jewish people," said Diamond. "I got involved partly because I love Israel, but also because I see daily what a full understanding of the real Israel does for one's Jewish consciousness. It deepens it; it adds so much value; it offers so much to add to one's consciousness."

"Toronto has many great Jewish institutions and many great teachers, but we wanted to bring the real Israel of today to the students so that they know more about the country and not always just what they learn from books," said Hilly.

"The age difference between us and the students in the school and synagogues is not that great," said Rosy. "We bring different, fresh perspectives as two girls who know Israel, love Israel, who breathe Israel every day of our lives, and who are here for one year to give that real sense of Israel to Toronto's Jewish youngsters."

Hilly and Rosy designed the "Israeli centric" curriculum themselves, which included a number of cultural projects, Israel programming, Kabbalat Shabbat services, and other informal education opportunities. Still, Hilly and Rosy found that an old standard was perhaps their most successful way of connecting with the youngsters – casual conversation.

"We talked to the students a lot of the time after school, in a more social setting," said Hilly. "Sometimes we talked about Israel and Judaism, other times we just talked about stuff that young teens like to talk about - who likes who, sports, music - that sort of thing."

The inaugural year of Makom proved so successful that, although Hilly and Rosy's terms ended in August 2008, the two pioneers have passed the torch to a group of eight new and talented young emissaries from across Israel.

"The first year of the Makom Synagogue Initiative exceeded all expectations," enthused Sarah Mali, director of Makom, at The Mercaz - UJA Federation's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education. "Not only were Hilly and Rosy able to have a lasting impact on Holy Blossom and the way in which the Temple now relates to Israel but they also touched the lives of individuals of all ages and of all levels of affiliation. A key indicator of success for us is the fact that within a very short space of time we successfully developed new partnerships with four synagogues and three new day schools around the initiative."

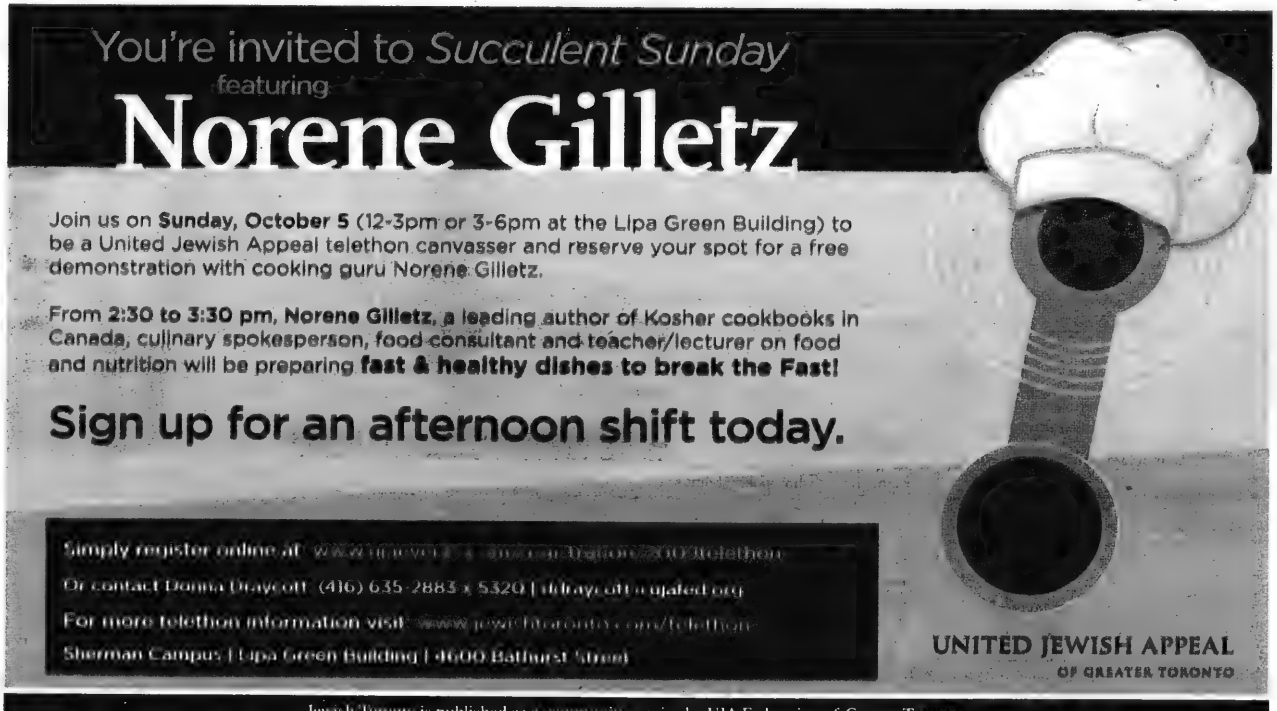
In September 2008, five synagogues – Holy Blossom, Beth Tzedec, Darchei Noam, Beth David and Temple Sinai will be partnering with four day schools – Leo Baeck, USDS, Heschel and Bialik, to house the new eight temporary Torontonians.

"We are so proud of what we started, but it's time to let the others continue the work," said Rosy. One of the things Hilly and I loved the most about Toronto – and it wasn't the winter – is how easy it is to be an Israeli in this city. If you're an Israeli outside of Israel, Toronto is a great place to be."



Super Week volunteers dedicated to Campaign 2009

Telethons ring up close to $3 million

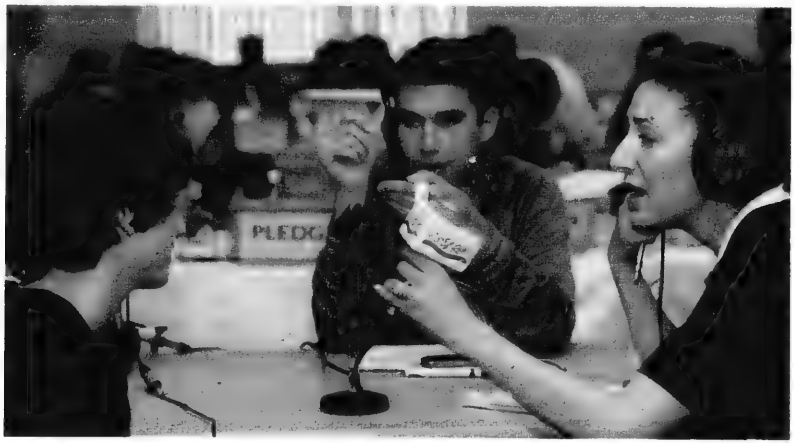
By Daniel Horowitz

Approximately 350 committed community volunteers came together on Sunday, September 14 – Super Sunday - to help raise more than $1.6 million towards United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2009.

Another 300 volunteers raised an additional $1.4 million during the subsequent Super Week – Monday to Thursday – for a total of $3 million overall.

The campaign, chaired by Fran Sonshine and Henry Wolfond, remains committed to innovation and creativity through new big ideas in order to ensure a strong and vibrant Jewish future across the street and across the globe, and is comprised of four initiatives:

- Inspiring Jewish Identity in the Next Generation
- Standing With the People of Israel
- Transforming Lives
- Engaging a Growing and Dynamic Community



EZ ROCK 97.3 radio personality Jessica Baker interviews canvassers at Super Sunday.

"From students to professional groups, there was such a great representation of passionate members from our community," enthused David Weinberg, the chair of UJA Campaign 2009 telethons. "Volunteers are our lifeline. We toss this line out to our community and pull in funds that allow our agencies to help change the lives of so many in need across the street and across the globe. I am very proud to be surrounded by the greatest canvassers and professional staff any community could ask for."

"The people I called all seemed to really understand how important it is to give money to the campaign this year; I didn't have to convince them too much to increase their gifts from last year," said Richmond Hill's Josh Starr, 22, a first-time telethon volunteer who decided to get involved following his first trip to Israel recently. "It's so important that Jewish Toronto helps the Israeli people and our own community. The campaign is really looking toward building a stronger future for all of us, so who wouldn't want to help out?"

Interest in Super Sunday was enhanced by the presence of Toronto radio station EZ ROCK 97.3 and personality Jessica Baker, who broadcast live from the event held at the Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services on the Sherman Campus.

"It's amazing to see how the Jewish community comes together for this event," said Baker. "It takes other organizations so long to raise a million dollars; UJA telethons raise well over that much in just one day. It says a lot about Toronto's Jewish community."

To make a campaign contribution, visit www.ujadonations.com or call the United Jewish Appeal Hotline at 416.631.5705.
To volunteer at United Jewish Appeal's next set of telethons on October 5, 6 and 7, please call 416.635.2883 x 5320.

Graduates of Holocaust Centre's Twinning Program honoured

By Sally Szuster

Over 45 bar and bat mitzvah students, committed to honouring the memory of a child who perished in the Holocaust, attended a special evening at Pride of Israel Synagogue recently, acknowledging their dedication.

More than 150 guests including students, family members and their survivor mentors attended the dinner, which included inspired speeches and a candle-lighting ceremony.

The UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto's Twinning Program enables boys and girls who are celebrating their bar and bat mitzvahs to share their special day in memory of a young Holocaust victim who never had a chance to reach this important milestone. Each participant selects a child with whom to twin, conducts extensive research and writes about his or her history, background, town, and ultimate fate. The Toronto youngster also meets with a friend or relative of the child who died in the Holocaust, who acts as a mentor to the student.

"Through this program, you've become witnesses to someone else's story," Lorraine Sandler, chair of the Holocaust Centre, told the students: "It now becomes your responsibility; you are the keeper of that story, and you will tell that story to your children and your children's children."

"You have demonstrated such commitment and responsibility," added Eleanor Getzler, chair of the Twinning Program.

Survivor Lou (Leizer) Hoffer, who mentored bar mitzvah student Sean Weinerman this year, told the story of a young boy who begged for food in the ghetto in the Ukraine where he and his family were forced to live.

"One day he didn't come," Hoffer told the audience. "We worried about him and when we went looking for him, we found him not very far away, frozen to death, still clutching his little thin plate – his only possession. Although we don't know his name or his family, he is one of many thousands like him who perished under similar circumstances during the Holocaust."

Ariella Swartz, who had her bat mitzvah on May 17, read from a poem that she wrote in honour of the 1.5 million children who died in the Holocaust.

"This project has shaped us into better people, better Jews and better teenagers. We will always remember what we have learned," she said.

The evening also featured award-winning children's writer Kathy Kacer who spoke about how, through her books, she tells the story of survivors and remembrance.

For more information about this program, please contact Mary Sikelos at (416) 635-2883 x 5301, or e-mail: bnaimitzvah@ujafed.org.

As a long-time supporter, Sharon Zuckerman knows a lot about Mount Sinai. But it wasn't until her husband, George, needed end-of-life care that the couple learned of the Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care. 'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Make shul more welcoming

Class Act
By Daniel Held

I often cringe at the thought of High Holiday services. For me, a regular shul-goer, the long services in a packed synagogue are among the least spiritual and inspiring. Each year, I try to imagine what the experience must be like for those who are not as comfortable in shul as I am – especially those who only enter the building a few times each year.

I imagine being stopped on the way into an already unfamiliar building and, while being scrutinized by security, asked to present the tickets for which I paid several hundred dollars. I imagine walking into a large room where the service is already underway and, trying not to disturb those praying, searching for an empty seat. I imagine sitting in a room with hundreds of other people whom I don't know, who don't speak to me and whom I don't dare speak to (after all, shuls are not places for talking).

I imagine listening to a cantor chant words in a language I don't understand from a book I find difficult to navigate. I imagine shaking hands with a rabbi who has hundreds of other anonymous hands to shake and can't spend time talking to me. I imagine leaving before the end of the service, mumbling that I can now check off one more thing from my to-do list and wait until next year when I must do it all again.

I recognize that for synagogues, the High Holidays are the busiest time of the year and that the logistical and ritual challenges of opening the doors to hundreds of new faces often overwhelm the skeleton synagogue staff.

Parallel to the planning of ticket sales, security arrangements and service preparations, however, synagogues must invest in planning the way in which they will welcome congregants – especially those who don't walk though the door very often. Such an investment will, ultimately, pay dividends during the quieter times of the year.

I'd like to offer some ideas to help synagogue professional, lay leaders and, in fact, all congregants transform High Holidays synagogue experiences into welcoming ones.

• Before the holidays, call the people who will be attending your services. If the congregation is too big to contact everyone, divide the list among a welcoming committee, or only contact those who will be attending for the first time.

• Assign greeters to stand alongside security. The role of a greeter is to make congregants feel welcome in the building, to answer questions and to point them in the direction of their seats, children's services, etc. Even if the conversation is as short as "Shanah Tovah," it can have an impact. Encourage regular congregants to serve as ambassadors and introduce themselves, at appropriate times, to the new faces in the room.

• Make sure that both the synagogue and the services are accessible. In the synagogue, the locations of services, children's activities and washrooms should be clearly marked. The service itself should also be easy to follow. Regularly announce page numbers or flip a chart with the page numbers. Have a booklet available explaining the service, with reference to the pages.

• Follow up with first-time congregants. Between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, give them a call. After the High Holidays, follow up again. Personally invite congregants to return for Simchat Torah or a Shabbat morning.

With hundreds of new faces coming into our synagogues for the High Holidays, we are presented with opportunities to engage new congregants.

The responsibility can't fall solely on our synagogue professionals, who are heavily taxed this time of year. Each of us must reach our to the person sitting next to us, wish them Shanah Tovah and welcome them into our shuls. Shanah Tovah.

Religious inspiration for Rosh Hashanah

Books
Bernard Baskin

Moments of Transcendence: Inspirational Readings for Rosh Hashanah*, edited by Rabbi Dov Peretz Elkins, Jason Aronson Publisher.

This anthology of religious inspiration for Rosh Hashanah brings together thoughtful and pertinent selections from some of the world's most eminent thinkers, poets, theologians and philosophers, both Jewish and non-Jewish, recent and ancient.

The author is a rabbi, an educator and a book critic. He writes that the collection is designed to renew the meaning of such High Holidays themes as sin, repentance, personal and social change, spiritual growth, commitment to high ideals, and deepening our capacity to love and appreciate the diversity of life.

The selections that follow are typical of the many hundreds that make this volume both valuable and necessary.

• The secular new year can be compared to a watch that tells the time. Rosh Hashanah can be compared to an alarm clock that not only tells time but also awakens one from slumber and bestirs one to responsibility. The shofar is physically nothing more than a ram's horn, but for the Jew it is a spiritual alarm.

– Rabbi Saul I. Teplitz in Life Is for Living

• Why was the First Temple destroyed? Because there then prevailed among the people these three heinous sins: idolatry, unchastity and bloodshed.

Why then was the Second Temple destroyed? Were not people then meticulous in their devotion to the Torah, to the mitzvot and to deeds of kindness? True; nevertheless the Second Temple was destroyed because people harboured baseless hatreds toward one another. From this we learn that baseless hatred is accounted as heinous as the three sins: idolatry, unchastity and bloodshed together.

– Talmud, Yoma 9b

• A man went to his physician to complain about his heart. The physician told him to stretch out his hand so that he might feel his pulse. "But doctor," said the patient, "it is my heart I am complaining about." "I know," said the physician, "but from your hand and its pulse I can tell you about your heart." The soundness of a Jew's heart can be judged from his hand. When the pulse of tzedakah does not beat strongly in the life of the Jew, it indicates a weakening of his total Jewish commitment.

– Author unknown

• During the year to come: may you enjoy good health and happiness, may peace reign over our country and throughout the world, may you have a kiss from your beloved, a smile from a child, a warm, cozy house with the aroma of good food baking in the oven, wise governors and merciful tax collectors, companionship of good friends and helpful neighbours. May you enjoy the fruits of your labours, celebrate birthdays and anniversaries, may the sun shine on your face, may you see a rainbow, may the Sabbath Queen enter your home with the teachings of the Torah, may you enjoy giving charity with a free hand, may you have an umbrella whenever it rains, may this year be happy, healthy, and prosperous for you and your loved ones.

– Author unknown

• The wife of the rabbi of Ropchitz said to him, "Your prayer was lengthy today. Have you succeeded in bringing it about that the rich should be more generous in their gifts to the poor?" The rabbi replied, "Half of my prayer I have accomplished. The poor are unwilling to accept them."

– Author unknown

• As we usher in the new year, it is my sincerest wish that you may have:
Enough happiness to keep you sweet,
Enough trials to keep you strong,
Enough hope to keep you happy,
Enough failure to keep you humble,
Enough success to keep you eager,
Enough friends to give you comfort,
Enough wealth to meet your needs,
Enough enthusiasm to look forward,
Enough faith to banish depression,
Enough determination to make each day better than yesterday.
And let us all say: Amen!

– Rabbi Harry H. Epstein

Rooting out an ugly prejudice

By YEHIEL BEN AYON

The remedying of prejudices and attitudes within society is a very slow process. What once presented itself in Israel as a potentially acute societal problem of two distinct societies – middle class Jews of European decent who comprised "the establishment" and an underclass of Jews from Arab countries – is no longer the lingering issue it once was.

Things have come a long way since statehood. This is not to say that the problem no longer exists, only that it has reached a level where blatant discrimination is no longer an accepted and tolerated fact of life, at least not on the official level.

Surprisingly, to this day, discrimination unfortunately persists in one part of one particular sector of Israeli society.

This week, the Supreme Court is scheduled to hear a petition against the Immanuel Local Council over its policy of segregating Ashkenazi and Sephardi girls in its Beit Yaakov school. (Please note that each Beit Yaakov school is completely independent and that the Beit Yaakov schools in Canada are autonomous. Incidentally, Bais Yaakov of Toronto in particular is internationally recognized for its inclusive admission policies.)

A further motion has been filed in Tel Aviv District Court citing the Beit Yaacov School in Elad. There, Sephardi girls are not being separated from their Ashkenazi counterparts. They are being denied enrolment outright. This year, all Sephardi girls in Grade 1 have been rejected.

While these are independent schools that enjoy a broad pedagogic free hand, they are nevertheless funded by the Ministry of Education, and the waters are being tested to see which ministry guidelines they may ignore while still receiving funding.

Boys fare no better. I am personally aware of families who felt the need to alter their Sephardi family names to more generic, Israeli-sounding ones in order to have their sons accepted into preschool.

This situation is pervasive, from preschool all the way to the highest yeshiva levels. Virtually all top-notch Ashkenazi yeshivot maintain quotas on how many boys of Sephardi origin they are prepared to accept.

Some 25 years ago, the then-Sephardi chief rabbi, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, was approached by a group of Sephardi community activists who wanted his permission to go public with the fact that virtually every Israeli yeshiva – including the top-notch, world-renowned yeshivot – had admission quotas limiting the number of Sephardi students they would accept. They argued before the rabbi that these discriminatory quotas were not only contrary to the Torah and Jewish unity, but that they were debilitating and the source of severe anguish to hundreds of otherwise bright, promising boys (and their families) who were being rejected simply because of their Sephardi heritage.

At the time, Rabbi Yosef denied their request on the grounds that it would be too confrontational. While I'm not aware that he has ruled otherwise, nor am I proposing that he would today rule any differently, it is evident that what was once tolerated is now being presented before the courts as being intolerable.

How times have changed and continue to change.

Rosh Hashanah, kids & the web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Rosh Hashanah is almost here – a time for solemn introspection. But that doesn't mean you and your family can't have some fun while getting ready for the holiday. There are plenty of websites that teach about the holiday through games, puzzles and activities parents can do with their children between now and Yom Kippur.

Virtual Jerusalem combines a good introduction to the holiday with games and more. There are holiday-related short stories and plans for creating a calendar, a mitzvah chart and a Jerusalem Tzedakah Box. The site has a page that tries to demystify the holiday and encourages kids to talk to God. To get things going, it includes comments from children aged four to six. Here's one from Sam, 6: "Dear God, Instead of making people die and having to make new ones, why don't you just hang on to the people you've already got here?" Sam, aged 6[tinyurl.com/virtkids]

The learn@JTS Kids' Corner emphasizes activities that parents can share with their children. We are told that we eat symbolic foods on Rosh Hashanah to portend a good year: we eat a fish head for a year in which we will be at the head and not at the tail. Then the website challenges families to adopt some brand-new food traditions. How about eating squash so that "bad luck may be squashed?" [tinyurl.com/jtskids]

With the holiday almost here, it's time to dust off the machzor and prepare for services. Uncle Eli's Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur Prayer Book is a delightful online variation geared to kids. Both serious and silly, these poems get across often difficult concepts such as forgiveness and repentance. [tinyurl.com/elirepents]

SocialAction.com points out that since Rosh Hashanah is the world's birthday, it is appropriate to do something good for the world. Start by having your family finish these phrases: "We thank You for the beauty of the world that we see in…" and "Help us to make our dreams a reality by helping us to…" [tinyurl.com/4qb2d]

We may no longer spend weeks huddled over a table preparing new year's greeting cards. But you and your kids can still send out special holiday wishes, thanks to the Internet. There are many sites that let you compose and personalize online cards, including Chabad.org. While on the site, check out the stories, crafts and recipes for some traditional and not-so-traditional holiday foods, including honey cake, honey wafers and candy apples. [tinyurl.com/chabadrosh]

For other crafts, take look at the ideas at Aish HaTorah, where you can find instructions to make your own Tzedakah Box and Honey Dish. [aish.com/hhFamily/hhArts]

If you asked children to draw pictures that symbolize Rosh Hashanah, what do you think they would include? That was the challenge posed to children in countries that receive assistance by the Joint Distribution Committee. You can see how young people from India to Siberia and Gamla, Israel, drew on their experiences to wish the world a Shanah Tovah. [tinyurl.com/roshworld]

The Aish HaTorah site has some really challenging puzzles and mazes. And after you read through the holiday articles at the site, you'll be ready for the quiz. [tinyurl.com/aishrosh] Here's a sample question.

What are the names of the sounds the shofar makes?

A. Tekia, Truah, Shevarim.

B. Tefilah, Torah, Sefarim

C. Tequilla, Brew-a, Collada.

Kids who like to colour shouldn't miss the Torah Tots site. They can print out and then decorate holiday symbols such as the shofar and Tashlich. There's also an online jigsaw puzzle in which you slide the little squares around until you make a picture showing apples and honey. [tinyurl.com/totsrosh]

When you're done that, try the Replace the "Pickle" quiz. Can you make sense of this example? "We blow the 'pickle' after davening during the month of 'pickle'. The shofar reminds us to do 'pickle.'"

(Answers: shofar; Elul; tshuvah)

And on that note, I would like to wish all my readers a good and healthy "pickle" in which you are inscribed in the "pickle" of Life.

The death of Orthodox chazzanut

By SUE FISHKOFF
JTA

PISCATAWAY, N.J. — Sitting in a meeting room in the Radisson Hotel here, 15 Orthodox cantors listen reverentially to a 1954 recording of the great Israeli cantor Leib Glantz singing the haunting Slichot service.

The album is somewhat scratched and recorded in mono, but the powerful, plaintive voice mesmerizes the cantors. One or two moan with emotion.

It is not an inappropriate sound at last month's annual conference of the Cantorial Council of America, the professional association for Orthodox cantors – the few that are left, that is.

While the Reform movement's American Conference of Cantors boasts 450 members and the Conservative Cantors Assembly approaches 550, just 125 cantors belong to the Orthodox association.

Even that figure is deceptive: many are retired or hold very part-time positions. Almost none make a living at the cantorate, even those employed full time. Their business cards carrying the names of real estate offices and computer companies tell the real story.

Orthodox congregations in America just don't hire cantors.

Cantor Bernard Beer, the director of the Belz School of Jewish Music at Yeshiva University, says that fewer than five per cent of U.S. Orthodox synagogues have cantors. That's not the case in Europe or Canada, he says, where Orthodox cantors are more widely used.

A generation ago, there were more than 30 Orthodox cantors in Brooklyn; today, there are three. Manhattan also has three.

It's a far cry from the golden age of chazzanut – or chazzanus, as most of the Orthodox cantors would refer to their leadership of services – when the great cantors of central and eastern Europe set sail for America in the years between the two world wars.

"Yossele Rosenblatt, Mordechai Herschman, Zavel Kwartin – they all came around 1921," Beer says, listing some of the big names in the business. "They made big money. It was the means of entertainment for Orthodox Jews."

The 1930s Depression put an end to big salaries, but even into the mid-1960s Beer says he'd open Jewish newspapers before the High Holidays and see "pictures of all the chazzans, in their high hats, this one singing at this shul, that one at the other."

The 1960s, with its anti-establishment ethos and changing musical tastes, affected the Orthodox cantorate as much as the Conservative and Reform, with an added caveat: the congregations were filling with yeshiva and day school graduates who could lead services on their own.

"Here in New York, volunteer laymen have taken over the services," says Beer, who recalls having "no problem" finding work when he became a cantor in 1965.

Some congregations are too small to afford cantors

Outside New York, he says, most Orthodox congregations are too small to afford cantors.

Another problem is the increasing popularity of the music of the late "singing rabbi," Shlomo Carlebach, whose tunes have permeated Orthodox synagogues and supplanted traditional nusach, or cantorial chanting.

The demise of Orthodox cantors has been accompanied by a rising interest in concert chazzanut. Some cantors supplement their pulpit incomes by performing onstage. The most famous, such as Yitzchak Helfgot and Moshe Stern, command top dollar at venues, including New York's Lincoln Center.

"People who say they don't like chazzanut will go to a Helfgot concert," laments Joel Kaplan, the president of the Cantorial Council of America and the cantor at Congregation Beth Sholom in Lawrence, N.Y.

Most cantors don't see the popularity of cantorial music onstage spilling over into shul.

"I see the handwriting on the wall," says Benzion Miller, the longtime cantor of Young Israel/Beth-El of Borough Park in Brooklyn, who says his own concert schedule has dwindled rather than grown in the past few years.

"I'd like to see shuls turn around and start hiring cantors. I'd like to say it will get them more members, but I know that's not true," he says. "I only hope that by the time they turn around, there will be cantors to fill the positions."

Few young men are going into the Orthodox cantorate. The Belz School, which has 150 students, graduates just one or two cantors each year. Most of its students are not on the cantorial track.

The few who are on that track are highly motivated.

Berel Zucker, 27, received his diploma last year and is now the cantor of the Chabad Jewish Center of Southampton, N.Y. Not only is chazzanut in his blood – his father was a cantor, and his entire family has musical talent, he says – but as a Lubavitcher, he looks at the cantorate as his personal shlichus, or mission in life.

"It's a powerful tool for bringing Jews close to their tradition," he says.

Even Zucker serves his congregation only once every three weeks. He cobbles together a living by preparing bar mitzvah students, giving voice lessons and leading services in other synagogues on his weekends off. He also sings at weddings.

In a bid to stimulate interest in cantorial skills, the Belz School and the Cantorial Council of America have begun sponsoring workshops to teach nusach to laymen, and to introduce the public to great cantorial music.

The school runs Internet courses for students who can't move to New York and tries to inculcate an appreciation of the cantorate among the rabbinical students who take its classes.

In 2006, Beer and Cantor Sherwood Goffin, who has been serving Manhattan's Lincoln Square Synagogue for 43 years, released Be a Baal Tefillah, a CD that teaches laymen the Shabbat service in both Ashkenazi and Sephardi pronunciation.

Despite the difficulties, Zucker says he would never discourage cantorial students.

"Some of the people who come to me don't have great talent and probably won't become a cantor," he acknowledges. "But who am I to stand in front of someone's passion?"

U.S. Conservative cantors adjust to reduced demand

By SUE FISHKOFF
JTA

KERHONKSEN, N.Y. — Two years ago, Temple Isaiah in Palm Springs, Calif., replaced its full-time cantor with a part-timer.

Then the part-timer left, and the Conservative synagogue replaced him with a lay soloist who was a member of the congregation.

"Our budget has shrunk, our membership has shrunk and the nature of the cantorate has changed," said Lenny Pepper, the executive director of the synagogue, where membership has fallen by half in the past 10 years, to 330 members.

Short on cash, and with worshippers happier to sing along with a guitar-playing lay leader than listen to traditional nusach, or cantorial chanting, Temple Isaiah decided to do without a professional.

The congregation is saving money and getting the kind of prayer service members prefer.

"Temples all over the country are facing the same problem," Pepper said. "In these tough times, everybody's trying to figure out how we're going to survive."

In today's economy, cantors in the United States are finding it more difficult than usual to find work. That's especially true in the hard-hit Conservative movement, where membership is dwindling and synagogues across the United States are downsizing. Cash-strapped congregations that are forced to choose almost always hire a rabbi over a cantor.

Conservative synagogues in Harrisburg, Pa.; Portland, Maine; Randolph, Mass.; and Chattanooga, Tenn., all recently let their full-time cantors go. Others, downgraded full-time cantor jobs to part-time, usually lay, positions.

But Cantor Ben Silverberg, president of the Toronto Council of Hazzanim, says the situation is different in Canada.

Cantor Ben Silverberg

"I do have colleagues in the States who are having tremendous difficulty finding jobs," he said. "With Canada, it seems as though the ones who have positions are holding them."

The 33-year-old cantor has served for the past six years at Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill. Before that, he spent six years at a Hamilton, Ont., congregation.

However, he noted, things have changed over the past few decades. In the 1950s, '60s, and even into the '70s,, there was more of an emphasis on davening and less focus on the pastoral aspects of a cantor's job, he said. "You judged a cantor on how he performed on a given Shabbat or Yom Tov."

Today, however, cantors are increasingly busy with weekly hospital visits, teaching, attending shivas and "opening our doors to congregants to complement what the rabbi does."

The American trend away from hiring full-time cantors is not apparent in Toronto or Montreal, Silverberg said. "We are working full-time, and I think we're valued as full-time employees."

However, he noted, a generation ago, older congregants of European backgrounds "loved to sit and hear a chazzan. Their children are the next generation, so we have to adapt."

That doesn't mean that there is less need for a cantor, he said. "Today's congregant [still] wants to be spiritually uplifted.

"Our challenge is to still be traditional, because we are cantors. We're not pop singers."

Yet, cantors such as Eric Moses of Beth Sholom Synagogue have introduced innovations such as a "Friday Night Live" service that includes musical instruments before the onset of Shabbat, Silverberg noted.

The job crisis in the Conservative movement was a major topic of discussion at the national convention of the movement's Cantors Assembly this summer in upstate New York.

"There are more cantors looking than congregations hiring," said Robert Scherr, the placement director for the Cantors Assembly, who places about 20 cantors per year among the movement's 760 affiliated synagogues.

In June, eight students graduated from the Jewish Theological Seminary's H.L. Miller Cantorial School. For the first time, two have not found jobs, noted the school's dean, Henry Rosenblum.

Scherr cites many reasons for the change. Among them are cantors with full-time jobs are retiring later and large congregations that are shrinking cannot afford to replace departing cantors.

Another reason, he says: some congregations in a financial position to hire a second clergy member choose an assistant rabbi over a cantor because, well, anyone can sing.

With supply outpacing demand, congregations are picky.

"Everybody wants someone 30 years old with 20 years' experience," Scherr said.

The Cantors Assembly is fighting the trend. Recently it began reaching out to Conservative congregations looking to hire a second rabbi and asking them to consider a cantor instead.

Cantors called upon to do more than just sing

The idea is to have cantors do more than sing. The assembly argues that cantors can lead a congregation's religious school instead of an assistant rabbi, and usually are paid less.

"We are proposing to congregations that they think more broadly," Scherr said.

The Rabbinical Assembly, the professional association of Conservative rabbis, is giving the move a diplomatic nod.

"I don't have a problem with it," said Rabbi Elliot Schoenberg, who heads the RA's placement division. "The Cantors Assembly should advocate for their people. I think synagogues should have cantors. A rabbi and a cantor is a good thing."

The key is for cantors to expand their marketability by increasing their job skills. Cantors in all the liberal movements are expected to do more than lead services and train bar and bat mitzvah students. More often they must teach adult education classes, train conversion candidates, perform pastoral duties, run summer camps and work in administration.

"The cantor-slash has become the reality, whether it's the cantor/music director, the cantor/religious school director – whatever," Rosenblum said. "It's the hybrid, the cantor who is strong in synagogue skills, who can read Torah and teach others to read Torah, that will make the best contributor."

Cantorial students are aware of these changes, and many welcome them.

"I have enough tools in my skill set," said Ellen Arad, a fourth-year student at the Miller school who considers herself primarily a teacher. "Part of re-envisioning the cantorate means there are other things you can do besides pulpit work."

To meet these new needs, the Miller school is overhauling its curriculum for the first time in 50 years. The changes are still being considered, but certainly will include greater emphasis on a wider range of professional skills.

Some cantorial schools already have made the shift.

At the transdenominational Hebrew College in Boston, cantorial students also are trained as Jewish educators, said Scott Sokol, the director of the college's cantor-educator program.

"Most cantors are Jewish educators anyway, but they play the role more from instinct than by training," he said.

The Reform movement, too, faces increased congregational expectations.

The School of Sacred Music at the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion has beefed up its professional development courses to include training in pastoral counseling and adult education. Even more than Conservative congregations, Reform synagogues want their cantors to sing tunes that they, too, can belt out.

Of the 50 reports Ostfeld received this summer from search committees at Reform congregations, 85 per cent said encouraging congregants to participate was "very important" in their decision to hire a particular cantor. The only factor listed as more important was "warmth and approachability."

Conservative and Reform cantorial school administrators say the popularity of sing-along prayer services does not mean their schools will teach less nusach, only that they are expanding their curricula to include a wider range of styles.

Last year HUC hired popular singer-songwriter Debbie Friedman to teach on its cantorial faculty – a move widely interpreted as the stamp of professional approval for Friedman's style of sing-along worship.

Friedman's first year "worked out beautifully," said Bruce Ruben, the director of the cantorial school.

Yet, Ruben insisted, the traditional approach is still important.

"The style today emphasizes intimacy, personal involvement, 'my' experience in the prayer service," Ruben said. "There's a whole other element in worship – the awe, the sense of mystery – that is completely missing. Clapping along isn't all that Jewish music is about."

Even in a tight job market, the best cantors continue to get jobs, movement leaders say.

Asa Fradkin, who graduated from the Miller school in 2007 and was hired as the cantor at Temple Sholom in Greenwich, Conn., said all the well-qualified candidates in the class ahead of him found jobs.

There's "still room in the synagogues for highly trained, professional cantors," he said.

Rosenblum says a professional brings something beyond just knowing how to sing.

"When a layperson leads the service, they're thinking: 'What are the tunes to sing here?' The davening falls by the wayside," he said. "The professional takes both into consideration."

Congregation Sha'ar Zahav, a Reform synagogue in San Francisco, hired its first full-time cantor last October.

The decision was not arrived at lightly, said Alex Ingersoll, a co-chair of the search committee. Some people wanted an assistant rabbi, as the congregation had a key group of community leaders with musical training who were adept at leading services.

"There was some resistance," Ingersoll acknowledged. "People asked, 'Does this mean we won't be on the bimah? Is this a statement that we are not good enough?' "

The cantor eventually began teaching cantorial music to the community leaders and introducing them to her repertoire of Sephardi melodies.

"She brings an extraordinary ruach [spirit] and joy to the service that is rubbing off on other service leaders," Ingersoll said. "There's a lot more attention to the prayers. It's not just, 'Now we turn to page this or that.' "

That's what the right cantor can bring to a congregation, Rosenblum says.

"We are not just musical adornment," he said. "We are the vehicle that can help people access the spiritual in their lives."

Speakers clash on how to fight campus anti-Semitism

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Drawing the line between anti-Israel rhetoric and anti-Semitism on campus is not the responsibility of Hillel or any other Jewish group – it's up to universities to do so, says a former senior Hillel staffer in Toronto.

Tilly Shames, who spent five years as associate director at Hillel of Greater Toronto before taking a job at Hillel at the University of Michigan this year, was one of three speakers at an event titled "Anti-Semitism on Campus," held at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue last week.

Martin Lockshin

More than 100 concerned parents and students gathered to hear Shames; Lawrence Hart, an associate professor of medicine at McMaster University who is involved in the Jewish community in Hamilton and writes a monthly column for The CJN, and York University Jewish studies professor Martin Lockshin, who just returned from a sabbatical in Jerusalem.

Shames began her speech by admitting that she was hesitant to speak about anti-Semitism on campus, because she prefers to focus on building bridges through dialogue with other members of the campus community and to advocate for Israel and Judaism in positive ways.

"We are spending a significant amount of time in our Jewish community focusing on the actions and activities of the anti-Israel community and internally criticizing one another for our response, or perceived lack thereof, and this is taking precious time and energy and resources away from the critical work that we're doing on campus, which is pro-active advocacy efforts as well as critical leadership development."

Having said that, she spoke about examples of anti-Semitism and said she is pleased at the way that university administrations continue to take steps to investigate and denounce anti-Semitic incidents when they arise.

But Shames added that since the start of the second intifadah in 2000, there has been more anti-Israel activity that has "pushed a line either towards anti-Semitism, blurred that line, or leaped over that line into anti-Semitism.

"It is a grey area that poses the most problematic challenge for university administrators to find where that line is. When does anti-Israel become anti-Semitic, and when does free speech become hate speech?" she asked.

"But it is not for us to determine. It is the university's decision, and it is the university's dilemma. It is not our dilemma."

She said that universities struggle with enforcing their own regulations, with ways to properly uphold free speech for all sides, and it's not up to Hillel to decide how to handle issues that arise.

"Hillel does not and cannot play the role as the police force on campus, and we cannot be held responsible for a rally of anti-Israel events happening on campus," she said.

"When the Canadian Jewish News' headline two years ago showed that Hillel failed to change the name of Israeli Apartheid Week ["Hillel seeks name change for 'Israeli Apartheid Week,' Feb. 9, 2006], it sent a message to the Jewish community that Israeli Apartheid Week was our failure. And it is not. It happens, and we can control our actions surrounding it, but we cannot be blamed for its existence."

She added that Hillel also doesn't want to defend Israel by putting down the rest of the Middle East.

"As Zionists, we should be celebrating Israel, and our standard for Israel should be much higher than saying it has a better human rights record than Saudi Arabia."

Exploring symptoms of Alzheimer's disease

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Misplacing your keys or forgetting a phone number are not necessarily signs of Alzheimer's disease: the time to be concerned is when you forget important information or things that are usually easily remembered, such as doctor's appointments or regular golf games.

"When there is a pattern like this, and other people, like family, friends and colleagues, begin to notice it, that's significant," says Dr. Ronald Petersen, director of the Mayo Alzheimer's Disease Research Center at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn.

Petersen was a physician to U.S. president Ronald Reagan and diagnosed his Alzheimer's disease in 1994.

Petersen was in Toronto recently, giving the fifth annual Andreae Alzheimer Lecture during the Alzheimer Society of Toronto's annual general meeting. The lecture was held in the George Ignatieff Theatre at Trinity College, University of Toronto.

Alzheimer's disease, Petersen stressed, is neither "just aging," nor is it a natural part of aging. "It's a degenerative disease of the brain, where the neurons start to fail," he said.

The disease's effect on a person is determined by the part of the brain in which the process is taking place.

If the cells in the language centre are affected, the person can't speak or understand what is said to him, Petersen said. If the cells in the frontal lobe are affected, there may be personality changes.

The cause of Alzheimer's is unknown, although Petersen said there may be a combination of genetic and environmental factors.

Diagnosis is by clinical means – in other words, by analyzing the patient's behaviour and symptoms. Petersen noted that "definite diagnosis of Alzheimer's is only possible on autopsy."

There is no approved treatment for mild cognitive impairment, Petersen said. Drugs, among them Aricept, have been tried. While the drugs slow down the disease for a year or a year and a half, studies have shown that by the end of three years, those who took the drugs are not noticeably better those who didn't.

Lifestyle modifications such as staying intellectually and physically active don't prevent the condition, but, Petersen said, they seem to slow its advance.

He said the span of the mild stage of the disease is eight to 10 years.

The Andreae Alzheimer Lecture is funded by the Andreae family of Toronto.

Ruth Andreae and her family established the lecture because they wanted to do something to help in the fight against Alzheimer's disease after her husband, Herbert, lost his battle with it.

Dr. Ronald Peterson

Andreae's son, Dan, was the first executive director of the Alzheimer Society of Toronto. He said that the family decided to institute a lecture series so that experts could share information about leading trends and developments in care and research.

At the inaugural lecture, in 2004, Dr. Kathryn Perez Riley, of the University of Kentucky, spoke about the seminal "Nun Study," in which 678 elderly nuns from the School Sisters of Notre Dame were tested for cognitive function.

Each lecture is videotaped and sent to Alzheimer societies across Canada.

The family believes that "knowledge and awareness is the first step in dealing with and finding a cure for the disease," Dan Andreae said.

Corrections

In our article last week, "Durban II prep conference called a concern," we reported that UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Navanethem Pillay slammed single-issue lobby groups for criticizing and distorting the UN's conference process. In fact, the remark was not made by Pillay in a speech, but by her press office in its write-up of the event.

The article headlined "More Canadians than ever make aliyah this year" (CJN Sept. 18) should have said that 230 people from the Toronto area will have made aliyah by the end of September. By the end of 2008, Toronto Israel Aliyah Centre expects that 270 Torontonians will have made aliyah, which would be the highest yearly total of olim ever processed by the centre.

Election 2008

It's up to you — get involved

By JOSH COOPER

As Canadians, we have a right and responsibility to participate in the democratic process and have our voices heard. Over its three-year existence, the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) has helped the Jewish community have an impact beyond our numbers by engaging our thousands of members and friends across Canada within the multi-partisan political process to advance prospects for a safe and secure environment for Israel and the Canadian Jewish community.

Guest Voice

By law, organizations funded by charitable dollars are not allowed to engage in partisan politics. Therefore, CJPAC is the only Canadian Jewish organization that can truly help support our friends and make sure they are elected or re-elected.

The Jewish community has a notable voting influence in less than 20 ridings across the country, yet there are 308 ridings at stake. Dozens of ridings are decided by less than a few thousand votes. In the 2006 election, one candidate won by only 28 votes in a riding with a population of more than 85,000 people.

Therefore, we must engage strategically, and, most importantly, we must vote.

It's also our communal and religious responsibility to play an important role in our country's well-being by participating in the choice of its leaders. Rabbi Yitzhak taught, "A ruler is not to be appointed unless the community is first consulted" (Talmud Brachot 55a). In this election, we are being consulted. Our vote, our time and our support are our answers.

At stake in this election are issues of concern to all Canadians, in addition to issues of special concern to the Canadian Jewish and pro-Israel community. In order to have your say on these issues, it's up to you to get involved.

It's up to you to get informed and learn more about where the candidates and parties stand on your issues. Visit itsup2you.ca to learn about your local candidates, to read or listen to interviews with the party leaders, and to find out what some issues of interest are.

It's up to you to get involved. Volunteering for an election campaign is a great way to build relationships with members of Parliament and other decision-makers. It's also a great opportunity for networking, professional development and community involvement. You will experience first hand how the political process works. Those who have volunteered in the past know how important and fun it can be. Fill out our volunteer form at itsup2you.ca/register, and CJPAC will pair you with the campaign of your choice.

It's up to you to support candidates. Within election fundraising and spending limits, it's easy to support friendly candidates in a significant way. Every dollar counts, and there are generous tax credits for political donations. Through CJPAC, you can target your support to our community's friends who need it the most. We are also able to ensure that every dollar donated is sent with the message, "Thank you on behalf of the Jewish community." Call Hersh Perlis at 1-866-929-9552, ext. 226, for more information on how to make your political dollars count for the Jewish community. Most of all, it's up to you to vote. By exercising your right to cast a ballot, you have a say in charting Canada's course on issues of importance to you and the community. For those unable to vote on Sukkot, you can vote at an advance poll on Oct. 6, or at any time during the election period at the district returning office for your riding. We are providing information on advance voting at itsup2you.ca.

We can all help to strengthen our community by being an integral part of the political process, to help candidates who support our community and to build relationships with leaders and decision-makers who will have an impact on our issues.

Elections are won and lost on the basis of citizen participation in the political process. We are looking to you to make a difference for our community!

Josh Cooper is executive director of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC).

Economy, health care concerns in Thornhill riding

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

With a Jewish population of about 32,000 in her riding, the Thornhill incumbent, Liberal Susan Kadis, says that it's inappropriate to hold the federal election on the first day of Sukkot.

"I've made it clear that there are members of our community being disenfranchised, because they cannot fully participate in election-day activities," she said.

Norbert Koehl

"It is an example of insensitivity, and of how political interests trump the interests of the community," added Kadis, who won the riding in 2004 and again in 2006.

Created in 1996, Thornhill riding is bounded by Highway 404 in the east, Highway 400 in the west, Steeles Avenue in the south and Rutherford Road and Highway 7 in the north.

In the 2006 election, Kadis, 55, a former public school trustee and Vaughan city councillor, beat Conservative challenger Anthony Reale with 53 per cent of the vote.

She is now running against former newscaster Peter Kent of the Conservatives, NDPer Simon Strelchik, and Norbert Koehl of the Green Party of Canada.

As a Jewish Canadian representing the riding with the highest percentage of Jewish people in Canada, Kadis said she stands strong with Israel. "I agree wholeheartedly with our leader, [Stéphane Dion] who said that when Israel's right to exist is threatened, it is an attack on the values of every democracy. Israel's fight for existence is our fight."

She said that she was one of the the first members of Parliament to speak out loudly against union boycotts of Israel, and she said she has been "consistent and outspoken against [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad's threat to wipe Israel off the map."

She said she has also been consistent in her fight against anti-Semitism, hate and "racism of any kind."

About a year ago, Kadis held roundtables across the country to hear the experiences of minority Canadians, and she chaired a task force that recommended funds be earmarked for security measures at places of worship, educational institutions and community centres. "I have championed the issue so that every Canadian will feel safe."

Her position on the United Nations' upcoming Durban Review Conference, also known as Durban II, she said, is that Canada should not participate, "because although the purpose is to eliminate racism, it encourages it."

She supports Senator Jerry Grafstein's initiative to hold a counter-conference at the same time, Kadis said. "This conference will have the same agenda but by contrast will be fair and balanced. It will serve as a positive counter to Durban.

"The [2001] Durban [anti-racism] conference was chock full of anti-Semitic rhetoric and propaganda, and it is already clear that Durban II would be tainted in the same way."

In the spring, Kadis said, she introduced a private member's bill to establish a national Holocaust monument in Ottawa. "This is to honour victims and survivors, and to teach future generations about the horrific consequences of state-sanctioned genocide."

Closer to home, she said, she supports an investment in the infrastructure, which includes new roads and an extension of the Yonge Street subway. "[Improved transit] is important for the environment and for the economy. It is very fundamental."

She is also committed to providing assistance to seniors and caregivers with a greater income supporting program.

Peter Kent, a journalist with more than 40 years experience in broadcasting, ran unsuccessfully in St. Paul's riding in the 2006 election.

He called Thornhill a diverse riding and said that issues vary from neighbourhood to neighbourhood. "Everyone, though, is concerned about the economy. They're hoping that we will not fall victim to the insecurities south of the border. What I tell them is that we are the only G-7 country with a balanced budget."

As a journalist, Kent has worked in Israel – he covered the Yom Kippur War – and he has "always been an admirer of the only democracy in the Middle East," he said.

Peter Kent

"As a fledgling politician, I am inspired by the prime minister's performance in terms of cutting off funding to Hamas, rejecting of Durban I, and boycotting Durban II."

For more than a year, he said, he has been involved in a pilot program that matches funding for institutions at risk of hate crimes. "Millions have been distributed, not only to Jewish institutions, but to any [place of worship that could be at risk.] These crimes still exist, though, and eternal vigilance is needed."

Election 2008

Candidates square off in largest Jewish riding

As far as his party is concerned, said Kent, "we cannot deny its productivity. Post-secondary students have benefited because they no longer pay taxes on scholarships and bursaries, and seniors have benefited from income splitting.

"We also support seniors who want to stay in the labour force. The new 65 is really 75 and 85, and [many want to continue working.]"

Susan Kadis

Simon Strelchik, a politics student at Ryerson University, ran unsuccessfully in 2000 and 2005 in the York Region District School Board elections, and in the 2006 federal election. He has been president of the Thornhill NDP since 2001.

He said that Thornhill residents are looking for change, "and are receptive to our message of a greener, accountable government that puts working families first."

Since the NDP's founding, said Strelchik, it has been a strong supporter of Israel. "My position is that Israel has been a home to the Jewish people, and deserves to be safe in its borders, and deserves respect from its neighbours."

At home, he said, he takes hate crimes very seriously, "because Jews have the right to not be afraid and stigmatized. There is a sanctity in their homes, cemeteries and synagogues."

Strelchik said that young people need to be educated about tolerance and acceptance, and should be taught about the Holocaust.

The NDP, under its first leader, was instrumental in pushing for the introduction of old age pensions, he said, "and these sorts of measures continue to be on the party platform. If you support a government that takes care of the people, then you should support the NDP."

He is in favour of a pharmacare program that all citizens can access, and in creating more training spots for doctors and nurses so health care is easier to access, he said.

He also supports the speeding up the approval of the credentials of foreign-trained health care professionals, and is working against the privatization of health care.

"Many seniors would be in serious trouble if they had to pay for health care out of their own pocket," Strelchik said.

"We have also been advocating for more long-term care spots for seniors, as well as support for seniors who want to stay at home. They need to have a choice."

Norbert Koehl, general manager of the Stonemill Bakehouse Ltd., said that the Green party's main platforms are the environment, the economy and health care.

"The economy is slowing down, and the auto industry is being hit. That is a big concern."

In Thornhill, said Koehl, building a new subway extension would cause a huge disruption, and it would take at least 10 years to get the Yonge Street line extended to Langstaff Road.

"We support public transit, but we have to look at the cost of starting such a massive project. We need value for our money, and we need something quickly. Dedicated bus lanes and street cars [could fit that bill.]"

Koehl is an advocate of ending mandatory retirement, and he said he supports more flexible retirement benefits for those who wish to continue working.

The Green Party believes in a preventative health-care system "that would remove the toxins and pollution that cost the health care system $1 billion each year."

On other issues, Koehl said that it is important for Canada to attend Durban II. "We can play a strong role in working with the countries of the world to find resolution and common ground."

In Israel, he said, his party supports a two-state solution to the Israel-Palestinian conflict that adheres to the pre-1967 borders and also seeks to incorporate an international plan for stimulating economic prosperity in both nations.

Simon Strelchik

"We are calling on both sides to adhere to international law and immediately stop the killing of civilians, and we encourage the Canadian government to press for a mutually agreed upon broker to engage in bilateral peace talks involving Palestinians and Israelis," Koehl said.

"We also call on Arab countries to use their influence to broker an agreement between Hamas and the Palestinian National Authority to facilitate the promotion of peace among competing Palestinian interests."

Election 2008

Liberal incumbent in the crosshairs in Richmond Hill

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The campaign to elect the next United States president will take nearly two years, but Canadians will have had just over five weeks to decide who will be Canada's next prime minister when the federal election is held Oct 14.

Since Prime Minister Stephen Harper announced the election date earlier this month, politicians have been scrambling to put together successful campaigns in their ridings.

Conservative Party candidate Chungsen Leung, Green Party candidate Dylan Marando, and New Democratic Party candidate Wess Dowsett have been working to convince their Richmond Hill constituents that incumbent Liberal MP Bryon Wilfert should be replaced.

Bryon Wilfert

Since 2004, the Richmond Hill riding, which has a population of more than 120,000 – seven per cent of whom are Jewish – has been bordered by Highway 7 in the south and Gamble Road and Elgin Mills Road East in the north. It lies between Highway 404 in the east and Bathurst Street in the west.

Leung, an entrepreneur and consultant; Marando, a 21-year-old University of Toronto student, and Wilfert, a former teacher who has been an MP since 1997 and has worked as a parliamentary secretary for both the minister of the environment and the minister of finance, spoke to The CJN last week about issues of interest to the Jewish community.

Toronto-native Dowsett, a staff representative of the United Steelworkers Union who is running for the second time in this riding, didn't respond to requests for an interview.

Here is how the Conservative, Green and Liberal candidates responded to important election issues.

What is your position on Canada's relationship with Israel and on funding the Palestinian Authority?

"I fully support Prime Minister Harper's stance with respect with Israel's right to be a country," Leung said.

"You have to understand my position. I was born in Taiwan and Taiwan was like Israel – orphans of the international community, because we were declared non gratas by Communist China in the '50s and '60s."

He said that when it comes to funding the Palestinian Authority, he would not support the "other side."

Dylan Marando

Marando said his party would seek to work with both sides in the conflict to arrive at a peaceful solution.

"We believe that Canada needs to be an active member of the international community and needs to be a leader in peacekeeping efforts… My personal position is that I would not be willing to fund the PA… I would want to protect Israel and to try to achieve peace in the region," Marando said.

Wilfert said he believes in maintaining a good relationship with the Jewish state.

"We believe in a strong relationship with Israel, which includes secure borders. We obviously would like to see a diplomatic solution that is in the interest of Israel for security purposes," Wilfert said, adding that the Liberals have supported the Palestinian Authority in specific areas, including education and health care.

How will you work to protect the environment?

Leung said that he would continue to promote the purchase of hybrid cars, encourage the building of eco-friendly homes and work to make it easier for commuters to access public transit.

"Let's start building new communities that are along the line of public transit, so what we can do, theoretically, is take the Yonge Street corridor from Newmarket right down to downtown Toronto, and say, 'All along this line, we will have multiple densities and those multiple densities will sustain the running of the subway line all the way to Newmarket.'"

Defending a support claim

Family Matters

Question. Is it true that marriage alone, without a domestic contract, provides no legal or economic protection to your spouse and children in the face of a support claim from another? (For example, someone from your past comes back to haunt you, using the Family Law Act).

Answer. Yes. The former spouse could, in many cases, use the Divorce Act to make a support claim, not just the Family Law Act. However, this is not true in all cases. If the marriage was of very short duration, and if your spouse was not truly dependent on you during the course of the relationship, or if there was clearly no need arising from the marriage, then the marriage itself does not automatically allow for spousal support. Otherwise, each case has to be examined on its merits. Does the woman really have a need? What are the former husband's financial circumstances and current child support responsibilities? Why did the woman wait so long to raise her claim? These are all legitimate questions that must be answered before a Court will consider spousal support. It is not automatically granted.

Question. My wife and I are separated and about to obtain a divorce. We have reached a minit separation agreement. Most recently, my wife's lawyer asked me to sign a Notice of Withdrawal in which I will withdraw completely the Answer filed to defend myself in the contested divorce proceeding. Do I really need to sign this to get the divorce?

Answer. I would have to read the agreement and be convinced that it was fair to you. Then I would have to be further convinced that by agreeing to a divorce you were not precluded from enforcing any of your rights, especially if you were facing any statutory limitation periods. Assuming these concerns were satisfied then the procedure your wife's lawyer is suggesting is very normal and is done all the time once two people have signed a final separation agreement.

However, you have written that you signed something called a "minit" separation agreement. Do you mean a "mini" or 'preliminary" or "temporary" agreement, something like an "interim" separation agreement? If so, then there may be good reason not to proceed with a divorce or to withdraw your Answer in a contested divorce proceeding until all the issues have been resolved.

On behalf of my family, and all of us at Garfin Zeidenberg, I wish you and your family a happy and healthy New Year.

The Centre for Jewish Studies at York University

MESSAGE FROM THE DIRECTOR

Sara R.Horowitz, Director

"Shalom shalom larahok velakarov" – "Shalom, Shalom, to the far and to the near."

These words make a particularly fitting beginning to our High Holiday greetings to the community. Drawn from the Yom Kippur haftarah reading and liturgy, which in turn draws from the book of Isaiah (57:19), the restorative prophecy promises hope, reconciliation, and redemption. The reading from Isaiah reinforces our tradition's teaching that our future is not predetermined, that our past does not seal our destiny. When we wish a sweet year "to the far and to the near," we do not mean the only the sweetness of material bounty and success, but more lasting sweetness offered by looking inward, by change and renewal.

As the yamim nora'im, the High Holidays, approach, we at the Centre for Jewish Studies appropriately extend greetings larahok velakarov, to the far and to the near. In so many ways, those words characterize our reach. Since its creation, the Centre's educational mandate has been a broad one, touching both the near and the far. The Centre brings the fruits of excellence in Jewish studies to our students on campus as well as to the larger community off campus. The education we offer our undergraduate and graduate students ripples well beyond the boundaries of our campus, across the country and internationally: our alumni are Jewish educators, professors, community leaders. Our faculty boasts excellent and committed teachers and world renowned researchers and scholars. Through them, our reach is far, and through them, the far is brought near.

The past year has been a noteworthy one for our Centre. Working with the Azrieli Foundation to collect, archive, and publish memoirs by Holocaust survivors who have come to Canada, the Centre is proud of the award-winning Azrieli Series of Holocaust Survivor Memoirs. With the acquisition of the library and rights to the published works of Rabbi Gunther Plaut, the Centre looks forward to programs inspired by this important collection. The Centre takes special pride in the awarding of the Dean of the Faculty of Arts Award for Excellence in Teaching to our Associate Director, Professor Eric Lawee, coordinator of the B.A. Program in Jewish Studies.

York offers the largest university level program in Jewish Studies in all of Canada, and one of the four largest outside of Israel. Outstanding scholars and dynamic teachers, our faculty members engage with students in ways that help define and deepen life commitments. York offers an undergraduate B.A. in Jewish Studies, a unique joint B.Ed.- B.A. in Jewish Teacher Education, as well as graduate training in Jewish studies. Our faculty serve as advisors and consultants for projects and institutions important to the Jewish community at home and abroad. Through a wide range of activities on and off campus, the Centre promotes Jewish Studies for Jewish and non-Jewish students, and offers stimulating programs for the community. We teach about Judaism, Jewish texts, history, culture, languages and literatures.

We owe our success to our faculty, our students – and to our many friends and supporters in the Jewish community, both far and near. I extend to all of you an invitation to become involved in the activities at the Centre. Join us for lectures and cultural events, check out our courses, and help us to grow and develop further.

On behalf of my colleages at the Centre, I wish all of you a fruitful and sweet New Year. Shana Tova.

This past year, the focus of the symposium was on Jewish Women and Jewish Texts. Renowned speakers included Professor Judith Hauptman, the E. Billi Ivry Professor of Talmud and Rabbinic Culture at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, and Professor Tamar Ross, professor emerita at Bar Ilan University in Israel.

BA in Jewish Studies

Now beginning its second year, York's Jewish Studies Program allows York students to earn a degree in Jewish Studies. Interdisciplinary and broadly conceived, the JSP offers students an opportunity to explore the richness and complexity of Jewish texts, thought, history, cultures, sociologies, languages and fine arts from biblical times to the present. While achieving shared expertise in a common core curriculum, Jewish Studies majors and minors also enjoy wide latitude to design a custom-made course of study suited to their interests. Jewish Studies majors and minor are eligible for the wide range of prizes and awards that York offers in Jewish Studies and for generous scholarship funding for study abroad, especially in Israel.

For more information, check out the program website: www.arts.yorku.ca/huma/jsp or contact the Program Coordinator, Prof. Eric Lawee (lawee@yorku.ca).

'Climate change is a reality,' says Liberal MP

He added that the government could consider forcing oil companies to use a portion of their profits to conduct research into sustainable alternative energy sources.

Marando spoke about a "revenue neutral green tax-shifting program. What we propose to do is increase taxes on polluters and decrease taxes on income and payroll and introduce income splitting. The result of the program would be more economic freedom for Canadians. People who work will be rewarded because their income taxes will be less, and those who pollute will be punished."

Marando said his party also wants to introduce "fiscal reform" that will encourage people to wean themselves off fossil fuels.

"We would create the green infrastructure strategy that would make it more convenient for people to use public transportation, to walk to work, to ride their bikes to work, and to buy fuel efficient vehicles."

From the Liberal perspective, Wilfert said, the debate about climate change is over.

"Climate change is a reality. All you have to do is look at what is happening in the Arctic… We have come up with the Green Shift [platform] and the Green Shift is not only dealing with climate change and making polluters pay, but it also deals with real tax cuts for Canadians," he said, adding that the concept has been endorsed by environmentalist and broadcaster David Suzuki and by the Conference Board of Canada, a major economic think tank.

Wilfert said he was involved with getting the funding for the new York Region transit system called Viva, and he's been pushing for a subway extension into Richmond Hill, up Yonge Street to Highway 7.

Chungsen Leung

What will you do about rising gas prices?

Taking a shot at the Liberal Green Shift plan, Leung said, "You don't go and slap a carbon tax or an energy tax on fuel when the prices are going up. That is totally counter-productive."

He said that the key to bringing gas prices down is to decrease our dependency on oil.

"Once the demand for oil goes down, the prices will go down. It won't go down by putting a carbon tax on it."

When it comes to dealing directly with the oil companies to prevent gouging consumers at the pumps, he said all the government can do is investigate whether there is collusion among oil companies to keep prices the same.

But Leung said that the government can and should place the burden on oil companies to look into alternative energy resources as the world's supply of oil diminishes.

"If you don't force them to do that or give them guidelines to persuade them to do it, they will start charging more and more for oil until it runs out or until no one can afford it."

Marando thinks that dealing with oil companies is not the way to improve the situation.

"Our plan, rather than approaching oil companies and encouraging them to decrease prices, is to eliminate our dependency on fossil fuels."

Wilfert, who accused the Conservative government of misleading the public about his party's proposed carbon tax on emissions, said, "We're not raising anything at the gas pumps. That was a fallacy that the Conservatives use." He said that the idea is to reduce income taxes and make polluters pay.

Where gas prices are concerned, Wilfert said the government should be more aggressive when it comes to enhancing the powers of the competition bureau.

"Over the last decade or so, there's been 10 convictions, where we had collusion in the market place. The difficulty is that it's very hard to get the smoking gun, but there is no question that we need to get stronger investigative powers for the competition bureau. I favour a regulatory system, but… we need to have justification."

Vote before 'important festival,' says Elections Canada

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

In a letter composed specifically to address the concerns of the Jewish community, Elections Canada last week reminded Jews that they can vote before Sukkot.

Reiterating what Jewish community organizations such as Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith and the Canadian Jewish Political Action Committee (CJPAC) have advised since the Oct. 14 election date – the first day of Sukkot – was finalized, Marc Mayrand, chief electoral officer of Canada, said the Jewish community should vote ahead of its "important festival."

"Jewish Canadians have concerns about how they will be able to cast their ballots," Mayrand said in a statement. "We want them to know that they can choose a method of voting that respects their individual circumstances."

Congress CEO Bernie Farber, told The CJN that Mayrand's office decided to issue the reminder and asked for Congress' help in disseminating the information via its community contacts.

The first option suggested by Elections Canada is to vote at one of three advance polls, to be held Oct. 3, 4 and 6.

"Voters who are observing the Jewish Sabbath can use the advance polls prior to sundown on Friday, Oct. 3, after sundown on Saturday Oct. 4, or during polling hours on Monday, Oct. 6. If you are registered to vote, you will receive a voter information card in the mail that will tell you where and when the advance polls will be held," according to Elections Canada.

Voters unsure of whether they are on the registration list should contact Elections Canada.

A second option for observant Jewish voters is to vote by mail or at a local Elections Canada office.

"Many people are not aware that they can cast their ballot at any point during the electoral period if they first register for a special ballot," Elections Canada said.

To vote by mail, an elector needs to complete an "application for registration and a special ballot," which can be obtained from a local Elections Canada office or on the Elections Canada website at www.elections.ca.

But Elections Canada warns that the completed registration form and the "required proof of identity and address must reach the local Elections Canada office or Elections Canada in Ottawa by 6 p.m. on Tuesday, Oct. 7" for it to be processed.

"What's essential is that electors are able to participate," Mayrand said.

In addition to the Elections Canada statement, last week Congress circulated a mass e-mail to community organizations urging them and their members to view a newly released guide on issues important to the Jewish community in this year's election.

"We encourage you to read Federal Election 2008: Guide to the Issues for the Community prepared under the auspices of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA)," Congress said in the e-mail.

Congress said the guide is aimed at "providing a comprehensive, non-partisan analysis of the issues of importance to our community, complete with policy recommendations and suggested questions for candidates."

It highlights topics such as security funding for the community; the threat of Hezbollah to the Middle East; the upcoming Durban II UN anti-racism review conference; the situation in Gaza; funding for senior citizens and "financial support that allows Jewish foundations and communities to continue their important work" of tikkun olam, the CIJA guide's executive summary says.

The guide also provides a list of questions that Jewish constituents can ask federal parties and candidates.

The complete guide can be viewed or downloaded from Congress' website at www.cjc.ca.

"Regardless of when you vote or for whom you vote, [CJC] encourages all members of our community to vote so our voice is heard on the issues of concern to our community," Congress said.

Congress also mentioned the efforts of CJPAC and noted that Jewish voters can participate in the election via its special website, www.itsup2u.ca.

B'nai Brith Canada has also issued its own guide, the Federal Election Task Force 2008: Issues of Concern and Recommendations for Action, which covers similar issues, as well as other items such as Aboriginal issues, war criminals in Canada and United Nations reform.

The B'nai Brith guide can be found at www.bnaibrith.ca.

Robert Lantos honoured at Israel's TIFF event

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Toronto producer Robert Lantos fell in love with Israeli cinema after seeing the 1972 movie I Love You Rosa, about an 11-year-old boy who has a crush on his sister-in-law.

"I thought it was wonderful, and I thought, wow, not only can we make great scientists, grow oranges, turn the desert into fertile land and build nuclear weapons, we can also make movies – good ones," the Hungarian-born Lantos told The CJN.

Lantos, the producer of Fugitive Pieces and Ararat, was recently recognized for his dedication to the Israeli film industry at Isreelized, Israel's inaugural Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF) event.

Hundreds of people gathered at the downtown nightclub Tryst during the festival to pay tribute to Lantos and to celebrate Israel's growing film industry. The event included performances by Israeli vocalist David D'or and Canadian singer Chantal Kreviazuk.

Amir Gissin, Israel's consul General for Toronto and Western Canada, organized the inaugural event, along with the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, to recognize Lantos' contributions in bridging the Israeli and Canadian film industries.

Israel had five entries in this year's festival – Ari Folman's animated Waltz with Bashir; Tatia Rosenthal's animated $9.99; Nati Baratz's documentary Unmistaken Child; Paul Schrader's magic realist Holocaust film Adam Resurrected; and Amos Kollek's Restless, an Israeli/Canadian production. Many of the movies were well received during the fest, and several screenings were sold out.

"Israeli culture is booming," Gissin said. "Israel is a volcano of talent – it's the most creative place in the world in terms of innovations, inventions and science, high-tech and also in terms of culture. In that sense, we have so much to offer, and there's been more world recognition for Israeli cultural achievements."

Lantos, founder of Serendipity Point Films and Maximum Films, fondly recalled the HBO film Sword of Gideon, which he made in Israel 20 years ago.

"I shot it in Israel and spent several months there – I had some of my best experiences making movies in Israel.

"It's a great way to get to know a country. When you're location-scouting, you look at every nook and cranny, the places you would not otherwise go." Lantos said.

He recalled the dedication and commitment of the Israeli crew who worked 16-hour days without complaining.

"I loved having all these men and women who were in service. When we shot the film, Israel still had the Sinai, so we shot most of it there, and people would come to the set in the morning fully armed and lay down their weapons. There would be one in charge of guarding them, and then they would go to work, becoming cameramen, costume designers – I loved to see that daily transformation," he said.

Lantos, who travels to Israel regularly, plans to film there in the future. After 20 years of pursuit, he recently acquired the remake rights to Exodus – a film that made him fall in love with Israel, he said.

At Isreelized, Lantos urged filmmakers to consider co-productions with Israel. Israel "has so many locations that don't exist here… also, in a co-production situation, it's possible to marry Israeli talent with Canadian talent – you can bring together the best of both worlds under one roof," he said.

Lantos latest film, Adoration, directed by Atom Egoyan, won the award for best Canadian feature film at this year's TIFF.

EDITH'S FASHIONS

Rise in anti-Israel rhetoric reported

Shames said the goal should be to marginalize radical voices to the point of irrelevance and to empower students who want to see an end to the clashes on campus between Zionist and anti-Israel students.

Lockshin spoke along the same lines as Shames, saying that the systematic anti-Semitism of the 1960s – when he was a student – is gone.

Today, he said, there are many Jewish professors, deans and university presidents. Jewish studies courses are developing and growing on campuses across the country, and most Canadian universities have developed some ties with Israeli institutions.

"But the glass is also half empty," Lockshin said.

Within the last decade, there has been a rise in anti-Israel rhetoric by what he calls the radical left.

"They spread half truths and lies about the State of Israel. It is uncomfortable for Jewish students who have to put up with demonstrations and postering about 'Israeli Apartheid' and other such lies."

He said that university campuses are extremely friendly to both Jewish students and staff, as well as the State of Israel, but when it comes to stepping in to stop anti-Israel groups from demonstrating on campus, his understanding is that they can't.

Lockshin said speech that is merely offensive and untrue is not considered hate speech, and until it crosses the line into hate speech, there is nothing a university can do to stop students and staff from expressing their views.

Lawrence Hart

"I say that we fight against the evil speech of our enemies by mocking it, by holding it up to ridicule whenever possible and to try to make more noise than they do," he said.

"I don't think we'll ever succeed shutting up the bad guy by force. I don't think we should ever suggest that their freedom of speech be removed unless they break the law."

Hart, for the most part, disagreed with Shames and Lockshin and suggested that Jewish groups can't afford to ignore the actions of anti-Israel groups.

The strategies to deal with them have been "misguided and self-defeating," Hart said.

"What we have been doing by not engaging is, in effect, encouraging, enabling and empowering the other side… By this attitude, we have been denying our students a particular opportunity to define who they are, to assert their identities as Jews and as Zionists."

He said that focusing on shared values to diffuse conflicts between anti-Israel groups and Zionists is a good idea, "but to import shared values as the way we should be responding all of the time, even in the face of the most vitriolic effigies, really is not the way to go."

Hart said that dialogue is important in reaching out to others, but it's equally important not to dialogue with the wrong people.

"Do they respect who we are? Do they respect the integrity and legitimacy of the State of Israel? And do they want to take part in a dialogue that will help them move forward as a two-way street?"

He said that the anti-Israel groups are very active and the reality is that they are not being marginalized.

Four years ago, U of T was the only campus that held Israel Apartheid Week events, he said.

"What we now have is an initiative on 28 separate campuses in Canada, the United States and elsewhere. If is growing, and we have allowed it to grow because we didn't take action right from the get-go."

During the question-and-answer period, some audience members aired their grievances and said that they didn't accept Shames' and Lockshin's views on the matter, and some even accused Hillel of not representing the students properly.

Shames responded by saying that the problems on campus can't be solved by yelling simplistic slogans.

"It is a matter of building relationships, sitting down with members of the moderate middle. I'm not suggesting dialogue with people who do not recognize Israel's right to exist. I'm talking about dialoguing with those who do not understand the complexities of the Middle East and making sure that our students are equipped with the kind of knowledge and the skills and the ability to be able to engage in deep and complex discussions with them."

Cotler explores legal remedies

it would expose the international criminal character of the regime, he added.

Cotler said the legal remedies that countries such as Canada and the United States could employ include bringing a complaint about Iran to the International Court of Justice under the Genocide Convention, while the UN Security Council could refer Ahmadinejad to the International Criminal Court to stand trial for advocating genocide.

The Security Council could also add sanctions for genocidal intent, in addition to those addressing Iran's nuclear program.

Countries could place Ahmadinejad on their watch list, making him inadmissible – similar to what was done with former UN secretary general Kurt Waldheim when he served as Austria's president, Cotler said.

"[Ahmadinejad] should be treated with the opprobrium of a genocidaire," Cotler said.

To date, little has been done on the legal front against the Iranian president because "people don't know what remedies exist. They don't know international law. They're not aware."

Former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet, former Yugoslavian and Serbian president Slobodan Milosevic and Bosnian Serb leader Karadzic did face legal sanctions for their roles in atrocities, but only after the crimes were committed.

"People don't realize they can intervene to prevent genocide by stopping the incitement," Cotler said.

WINNIPEG — Blue cardigans, long sleeve pullovers, vests, ladies tartan kilts, and dress pants are some of the new items that students at the Gray Academy of Jewish Education have been wearing since the school instituted uniforms at the start of this year.

"The impetus for moving to school uniforms was the idea that uniforms level the playing field financially between the haves and the have nots," said head of school Rory Paul.

Because of the uniforms, children will not compete with each other through what they wear, Paul said, adding that the uniforms create "school pride and a sense of belonging."

"We have a culturally varied student body. We have children who immigrated to the city from Argentina, and we have many children whose families are Russian Israelis, as well as children that were born here. Uniforms help integrate children and create a common community."

Faith Kaplan, a member of the school's board who led the drive to bring in uniforms, said the board felt that they would "set a tone which would enhance the learning atmosphere appropriate for a Jewish school and strengthen school identity."

Paul said the school board made a decision to put the words "Gray Academy" on the uniforms rather than "Gray Academy of Jewish Education" because the board had "a mild concern" that the "children might suffer repercussions" if they went out into the general community wearing clothes that indicated they're Jewish.

"Because the uniforms are likely to be worn when the children are in the regular community, we didn't want to bring attention to the fact that we were specifically a Jewish school," he added.

He also said that the school, which has a reputation for excellence, has become well known in the city as "Gray Academy."

Yechescal Greenfield, a parent at the school, praised the change.

"I like uniforms because it saves the hassle of my kids deciding what they have to wear every morning, and there are a number of different uniform pieces so children can have some individuality."

Kaplan said that the feedback she has received on the uniforms has been "consistently positive."

She added: "The overall consensus is that our students look more professional, and part of a school unit. Students and staff seem to be pleased with the positive reaction from the community. Parents of new students have commented on reduced stress from their children as the fashion playing field has been levelled."

Paul said one teacher remarked that "he has noticed that there is less horseplay in the halls among Grade 7 and 8 boys now that they are wearing uniforms," and he added that "parents have told me that they think the uniforms make the children behave more respectfully."

The decision to implement uniforms took two years to make.

A committee of board members and parents, led by Kaplan, held focus groups with high school students and parents.

"The committee also did research by contacting other Jewish day schools and independent schools in Canada and the United States to see what their experience was in regard to uniforms," Paul said.

Sutton Group Admiral blazes new trails in real estate

Murray Goldkind
Broker of Record

Using a simple formula of maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle for its agents, Sutton Group Admiral Realty has experienced the kind of spectacular growth that has surpassed even its own high expectations.

The record-breaking sales achieved by its ever-growing team, which now numbers over 220 agents, has allowed Sutton Group Admiral to not only consolidate its niche atop the residential resale market, but also to enter the highly competitive field of new home construction sales.

Brokers Of Record and co-owners Saul and Murray Goldkind pride themselves on their ability to read and respond to the needs of home buyers and sellers. Says Murray: "Today's home buyers are looking for one thing: VALUE. The agents and brokers who give them maximum value for their hard-earned dollars will earn their business. Those who don't, won't." And implicit in this value, he notes, is the quality of service provided by the broker or agent. "If you have to do more than say, 'I'll take the red one,' we're not doing our job."

In its dual capacity as reseller and new home purveyor, Sutton Group Admiral's access to both resale homes and new construction allows it to offer home buyers the best of both worlds, says Sol. "Whether you're looking for a resale home or a new one, you can now explore ALL your interests and options with us."

One thing that hasn't changed, says Sol, is Sutton Group Admiral's commitment to work "24 hours a day to earn your trust and ensure your satisfaction."

Firebomber's mother found guilty

MONTREAL — The mother of the firebomber of a Jewish school in 2004 is not likely to spend any time in prison, despite being declared guilty last week of being an accessory after the fact in the crime.

Rouba Elmerhebi Fahd, 40, was found by Quebec Court judge Robert Marchi to have tried to arrange for her son, Sleiman Elmerhebi, to leave the country after he set fire to the library of United Talmud Torahs in St. Laurent using six canisters of kerosene and left behind a written message signed by "les Brigades du Cheik Ahmed Yassine" that threatened more severe retribution for Israel's actions in the Middle East.

The 19-year-old pleaded guilty to arson in December 2004 in exchange for dropping a conspiracy charge. He was sentenced to 40 months in jail after the judge deemed it an act of hate and terrorism.

Fahd is to be sentenced Nov. 25.

Crown prosecutor Anne Aubé asked for community service for Fahd, even though the maximum penalty is seven years in jail.

Fahd's lawyer Gilles Pariseau is seeking an unconditional discharge, noting that his client's case had been delayed repeatedly for more than four years. An unconditional discharge would mean she would have no criminal record.

She has been free on $10,000 bail since her arrest in May 2004, a month after the firebombing.

The evidence against Fahd was collected mainly by police wiretap of both her and her son's telephone conversations, the court heard. In one, he confirms that his mother knew about the firebombing shortly after it happened. The fire destroyed the library, causing $300,000 in damages.

Fahd phoned a travel agent on a number of occasions asking for information on flights to Brazil and expressing a wish to purchase one ticket for her son, although no reservation was ever made.

Aubé told reporters afterward: "We have to consider that she's a mother and it's been four years since that happened… it's not the most important crime in the Criminal Code. This lady is not a criminal. What she's done is a criminal offence, but I don't think she's the perfect example of a criminal."

Fahd, a Lebanese immigrant, has three children younger than her son.

B'nai Brith Canada welcomed the guilty verdict. It said the sentence must reflect the gravity of the offence.

"The court decision sends the important signal that not only the perpetrators of such violent hate crimes, but those that provide assistance and support will be held accountable as well," said Moise Moghrabi, regional chair of the organization's League for Human Rights.

"The devastating impact of this 2004 firebombing… is still being felt not only in Quebec, but by Canadian Jewry across the country."

Pearl's widow kicks off Ottawa campaign

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Mariane Pearl, widow of murdered Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, was keynote speaker at the Jewish Federation of Ottawa's annual campaign kickoff.

Mariane Pearl addresses campaign launch in Ottawa.

Pearl told her story, beginning with how and when she met her husband and about their adventures as travelling journalists leading to the fatal assignment in Pakistan.

They had been living in India at the time of the 9/11 terrorist attack in New York, Pearl recalled.

"We immediately went to Pakistan," she told the Sept. 9 event. "There was a strong feeling that that was where journalists needed to be at that time. At that time, things were scarier in New York than in Pakistan."

In one of life's tragic ironies, Pearl said, "Danny refused to go to Afghanistan because he didn't feel it was safe there for journalists."

The world later witnessed, over and over again, the horror of Daniel Pearl's last moments, captured on video by his murderers. His final words, including the statement "I am a Jew," resonated the world over.

Pearl's story, related in her book A Might Heart: The Brave Life and Death of My Husband Daniel Pearl, was also made into a Hollywood movie last year starring Angelina Jolie, so many in the audience at the kickoff were familiar with the details.

During the five weeks between her husband's kidnapping and the discovery of his body, Pearl remained strong and in control of the search. Although she was pregnant, alone and extremely fearful, she knew that "If I broke, we were defeated."

In the midst of the horror, there was a positive outcome: "The search for Danny brought together people of all religions, men and women, Americans and Pakistanis, journalists and police… everyone broke their boundaries for the common goal," Pearl said.

Since her husband's death, Pearl has told and retold his story as she travels around the world. She said she is determined to defeat the terrorists by refusing to succumb to feelings of revenge and hatred.

"For me, it is no joke to say that it takes as much determination to work for tolerance as it takes for a terrorist to blow himself up," she said. "I felt that I had to display the same kind of courage in life as he had in death."

She said she is also working very hard to set an example for the couple's son, who was born after his father's death.

Campaign chair Jason Shinder outlined some of the work being done by the federation's various beneficiary agencies.

There are many success stories, but costs for everything have increased and so have the needs, he said.

"We need more – we need more volunteers, we need more donors and we need much more money," said Shinder, asking that donors consider increasing their pledges this year by a minimum of 10 per cent to help reach the campaign goal of $5.2 million, of which the Women's Division hopes to raise $800,000.

Ottawa educator recognized for years of excellence

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Irv Osterer is well known locally as an athlete and a teacher. He has recently been recognized publicly for both, receiving three awards in a very short period of time.

Osterer – a teacher at Merivale High School who has been an educator for nearly 30 years, 18 of those as a department head – received the Capital Educator's Award from the Ottawa-Carleton Research Institute (OCRI) as well as the Ottawa-Carleton District School Board's (OCDSB) highest honour, the Director's Citation. For his athletic prowess, he received the Lou Honigman Award for athletic performance and sportsmanship in the Jewish Men's Softball League.

The OCRI award was a great thrill for Osterer, because, he said, "it is almost impossible to be nominated for this honour, and to be selected as one of 16 educators from the entire educational community in eastern Ontario was like winning the Stanley Cup!" Nominees are all positive role models who display excellence in teaching.

The awards ceremony was suspenseful and exciting. "All the nominees were invited... and the winners were chosen much like they are selected at the Academy Awards. No one knew who won until each selection was made. So, in front of over 500 people that night in May, I was very shocked to be recognized. And my acceptance speech made the CTV news," he said.

Osterer studied at the Ontario College of Art and Design and Queen's University, and he received a master's of educational administration from the University of Ottawa.

He has combined his two interests by teaching what he loves.

He taught visual art, graphic design and photography for nine years at A.Y. Jackson Secondary School in Kanata, where he developed curriculum for photography and graphic design. He was also art co-ordinator and later arts department head at Confederation High School until it closed in 1999, and he has been at Merivale High ever since.

Chaverim

As we approach the High Holidays, it is an opportunity to gather with our families and reflect on our actions and inactions, and the aspirations we had and those we forgot about because of difficulties.

While the Holidays are the same each year, each year we are different. Each year, we experience the Holidays differently.

Rosh Hoshanah celebrates our tradition. It's a reaffirmation of the Almighty's mercy, glory and love. Yom Kippur is a time for repentance and a time to ask for forgiveness.

In these days of reflection, prayer and sorrow for our entire people, let's not forget the trying circumstances, the difficult times in Israel. Our support for the State of Israel will always be strong and everlasting.

May our prayers have meaning, passion and greatness. May our prayers for our families and for the State of Israel, and for the world be heard – and may we be granted health, prosperity and fulfilment along with blessing and peace.

My wife Maida and our family, join with the National Executive Committee of Maccabi Canada, our athletes, coaches, volunteers and the hundreds of people who support the development of young Jewish athletes throughout Canada, in extending sincere best wishes for a Happy and Healthy New Year.

Shana Tovah!

Allen Gerskup
President, Maccabi Canada

Coast to Coast

Grade 12 students exempted from rule

"The committee went to schools that were brand new and using uniforms and other established schools, like ourselves, who brought in uniforms. The issue was thoroughly researched."

The board decided that for this year, Grade 12 students wouldn't be required to wear the uniforms, since their parents would have to buy uniforms but they would only get one year's use out of them.

"But as it turns out, most Grade 12 students, especially the girls, have purchased pieces of the uniforms, because they want to wear them," Paul said.

According to Paul, staff at the school had a meeting and decided to wear "more professional clothes than have been worn in previous years. Now you won't see staff wearing jeans unless it is a special day where casual clothes can be worn."

There has been some criticism of the new uniforms.

One individual who did not want to give his name, commented: "If the school moved to uniforms so as to prevent some children from wearing what would be considered inappropriate clothing, then I agree with it. But if they did this so that they could be like other private schools in the city… then I'm not pleased about it."

A former student at the school, who also did not want to give her name, said, "You can still differentiate the wealthier kids from the less wealthy, because there are a variety of items that can be purchased, and the wealthier kids purchase all of the items whereas the less wealthy can't afford to do so."

Ottawa teacher plans holiday activities

For the past nine years, Osterer has been a department head with primary responsibilities in the fine arts, serving as well as department head for technology and modern languages.

Osterer is now reaching out to students in other local high schools and has designed a pilot program for this fall that gives students at other local schools access to Merivale's graphic design program.

Osterer has also made artistic contributions to the Jewish community, including designing the current logos for Hillel Academy school, Camp B'nai Brith and the Jewish Men's Softball League. He is also editor/designer of Shuleinu, Congregation Machzikei Hadas' shul bulletin.

He said his "15 seconds of sports fame" came when he designed the rally rags for the 1992 World Series in Toronto. He is also a member of the Society for International Hockey Research and is working on a book about "Jewish hockey."

Noting that two of his own Jewish teachers were very strong influences on him – the late Joshua Heilman at Hillel Academy and his high school English teacher, Sid Katz – Osterer said he makes an effort to be a mentor to Jewish students at Merivale.

He and colleague Linda Slotin organize Jewish events around the holidays and try to give students a positive and strong identity.

"We may only have 30 Jewish kids at Merivale, but for Chanukah, Purim and Pesach… we get together to eat, shmooze, talk about the holiday we are celebrating, and even sing… We do this to make sure our Jewish kids feel good about being Jewish, and that they know they have a place to come to if they want to talk."

Apples, honey and wishes for a sweet New Year

By NORENE GILLETZ

Marcy Goldman is one of my favourite cookbook authors – reading her books and recipes always makes me hungry for more!

Goldman has a true "passion for baking"– which also happens to be the title of her latest cookbook, A Passion for Baking (Oxmoor House). Her book offers 220 picture-perfect recipes along with her favourite tricks of the trade to help her readers become better bakers. A professional chef and master baker, Goldman is also the author of The Best of BetterBaking.com and A Treasury of Jewish Holiday Baking.

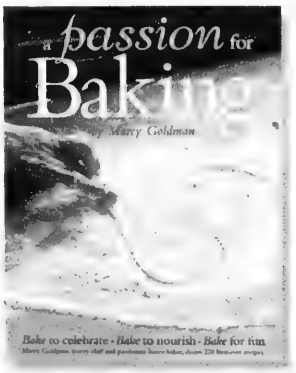
It doesn't matter if you're a novice baker or an experienced balabuste – you'll love her latest book. The ingredients are easy to find and her recipes are user-friendly. It's just like having a good friend in the kitchen right next to you sharing helpful advice and offering professional guidance to help you achieve excellent results. Goldman wants you to bake more often and she also wants you to enjoy the journey!

Goldman is extremely creative, often putting new spins on old favourites. Whenever she bakes, she always draws a heart in the flour on the counter top. One of her sons took a photo of her special "art/heart," and this inspired the photo on the cover of A Passion for Baking.

"Homey stuff may not always be picture-perfect," Goldman says, "but it is absolutely, undeniably beautiful. It is food created with care that is meant to nourish in every way. That said, I intend to share with you each and every trick 'in the book' on baking, to make your recipes foolproof and beautiful."

When I interviewed her recently, I asked her what was her favourite recipe. Goldman replied, "If I'm not near the recipe I love, I love the recipe I'm near!"

She sweetly shared two of her favourite recipes from A Passion for Baking with you, my readers, to enjoy for the High Holidays. She also shared her amazing recipe for a bread pudding that she makes with the leftover honey cake from Rosh Hashanah. (The recipe is not in any of her books but is only available on her website at www.BetterBaking.com.) Goldman loves to serve this "honey of a bread pudding" for breaking the fast after Yom Kippur. I can't think of a better way to guarantee that you'll have a sweet year! Happy baking, happy eating and a happy and sweet New Year!



Baking book offers recipes and hints

Marcy Goldman's top baking tips:

• First and foremost, I recommend double sheeting. It is my method of stacking two baking sheets so that there's a cushion for even baking and no risk of scorched bottoms.

• Shred cold butter with a box grater if you forget to take the butter out to soften. You can also shred apples for a quick-and-easy fruit pie. And you can shred frozen pastry dough for an easy alternative to lattice pie topping.

• In home baking, unsalted butter is queen. Nothing tastes or performs quite like this classic choice, prized for its pure flavour that sings through with utmost clarity.

• To start, I advise you to first thoroughly read a recipe. It is the difference between good baking and superlative baking… reading a recipe beforehand and having ingredients at the ready are small musts that make the whole endeavour calming, which, in turn, contributes to the final outcome.

• When measuring flour, I recommend that you lightly whisk or stir it a bit in its canister first; then simply scoop the flour, using a metal dry measuring cup and level it off.

MARCY GOLDMAN'S ROUGEMONT APPLE PASTRY CAKE

This is one of my favourite pastries of all time – one you will want to make again and again. Simply put, this cake, based on a pastry crust, will make you famous. The pastry crust lines a springform pan, and the filling is a mile high with apples. It is, as I always boast, worth the price of the book.

Rougmont, incidentally, is Red Mountain in French, and refers to the apple region just outside Montreal. Many apples from those orchards have met their destiny in this recipe. This dessert needs an overnight stay in the fridge before serving. If you have store-bought refrigerated or frozen pie dough on hand, using it is fine and will save you a step.

A creative idea for leftover honey cake

How many apples are enough? Ever find you follow a recipe for pie or anything requiring a fruit filling only to find out your filling doesn't quite rise to the occasion? You want the filling to be almost flush with the top of your pan in any pastry or pie. To test out what is a sufficient amount of apples (or blueberries, peaches, etc.) for a specific recipe, prepare the fruit and place it in the empty pie pan and see if you require more fruit. Then prep whatever extra you need. That way, the fruit is prepped and you can be confident that you will have enough filling.

Pastry crust
2 cups all-purpose flour
1 tbsp. sugar
1/2 tsp. salt
3/4 cup unsalted butter, cut into chunks
4 to 6 tbsp. ice water or half-and-half
Apple filling
10 to 12 large apples, cored, peeled and cut into 1/4 inch slices
1/4 cup sugar
1 tbsp. cornstarch
1 tbsp. ground cinnamon
1/2 cup raisins, plumped in hot water, drained and well-dried
1 tbsp. lemon juice
Vanilla sauce
1/2 cup unsalted butter, melted
1 cup sugar
2 tsp. pure vanilla extract
4 large eggs
2 tbsp. all-purpose flour
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
Finishing touches
confectioners' sugar
apricot jam, warmed

Line a baking sheet with parchment paper. Brush bottom and sides of a 10-inch springform pan with melted butter and place on baking sheet.

For the pastry crust, place the flour, sugar, and salt in a food processor. Add butter and pulse to make a grainy mixture. Add water and pulse to make a shaggy dough. On a lightly floured work surface, gather dough together, kneading a few moments to make a smooth dough. Wrap and chill dough at least one hour before rolling out.

Meanwhile, for the apple filling, toss apples with sugar, cornstarch, cinnamon, raisins, and lemon juice.

Preheat oven to 350. Roll or press out dough evenly and fit on bottom and sides of prepared pan (dough should be 1/8 to 1/4 inch thick). Fill with apple filling, pressing gently. For final layer of apples, arrange apples in concentric circles. Apples should come to top of pan. If they don't, prepare more to fill out the pan, tossing with 2 tablespoons sugar and a touch of cinnamon.

Cover pan lightly with aluminum foil and place on baking sheet. Bake cake 60 to 75 minutes or until apples are soft, removing foil after 20 minutes. The top apples might seem dry and browned around their edges, but interior apples should begin to feel soft – use a skewer to test apples.

For the vanilla sauce, in a small bowl, blend melted butter, sugar, vanilla, eggs, flour and cinnamon. Pour this over hot pastry cake, trying to get sauce to drip into crevices. Bake another 20 minutes. Cool on a wire rack.

Refrigerate pastry cake at least 6 hours or preferably overnight. Dust with confectioners' sugar or brush with warmed apricot jam just before serving. Makes 12 to 16 servings.

Honey cake history

Some bakeries sell huge honey cakes that are cut into mammoth slabs. Sometimes they are baked in industrial baking pans, their sides lined with greased brown baker's paper. Goldman likes the look and generous cuts that result. Here is a home-style version from A Passion for Baking that features great home-made taste with the wonderful, commercial look of a real bakery-style honey cake.

THE BIG HONEY CAKE

This is, regardless of which holiday you celebrate, a huge, totally awesome, exceptionally flavourful honey cake. It lasts up to a week covered, or two to three months if frozen. Use leftovers to make bread pudding.

7 cups all purpose flour
2 tbsp. ground cinnamon
1 1/2 tsp. ground cloves
1 1/2 tsp. ground allspice
2 tbsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. baking soda
3/4 tsp. salt
2 cups vegetable oil
1 cup honey
3 cups white sugar
1 cup firmly packed dark brown sugar
1 tbsp. pure vanilla extract
1 tsp. pure orange extract or orange oil
7 large eggs
1 1/3 cups brewed coffee or tea
1 cup cola
1/2 cup orange juice
1 cup slivered almonds, optional
confectioners' sugar, for dusting

Preheat oven to 350. Line bottom of a 13 x 9-inch pan with parchment paper. Spray paper and inner sides of pan with nonstick cooking spray. Cut out pieces of brown paper (do not use recycled paper) to line the inner sides and make a cake collar for the pan, letting pieces extend 3 to 4 inches above pan. This is a cake "girdle" that will support the cake as it rises high. Spray paper collar with nonstick spray. Line a baking sheet with parchment paper and place pan on it.

Honey cake the next day

In a very large mixing bowl, hand-blend flour, cinnamon, cloves, allspice, baking soda, baking powder and salt. Make a well in centre and add, in order, oil, honey, white and brown sugars, extracts, eggs, coffee or tea, cola and orange juice; blend well. Scrape sides and bottom of bowl occasionally to ensure batter is evenly blended. Pour or spoon batter into prepared pan. Sprinkle with slivered almonds, if desired.

Bake 1 hour and then reduce oven temperature to 325 and bake 45 minutes. Test cake for doneness, and if not quite done, reduce oven temperature to 300 and bake until done, another 10 to 15 minutes or until cake is firm to the touch. Cool completely in pan. Dust with confectioners' sugar.

To serve, cut cake lengthwise down centre and then into big slabs. Makes 24 to 30 servings.

HONEY CAKE BREAD PUDDING

Leftover honey cake? Don't even think of throwing it out. Cut up in hunks, bathed in an egg/cream bath and baked, it becomes a bread pudding. Serve warm or cold, with cream or sour cream. It is subtly spicy, delicate, eggy, and sweet – replaces blintzes and updates tradition. Frugality is the motherhood of creativity. Creativity reinvents tradition. It can be baked and frozen or made ahead and baked just 40 minutes before serving.

5 to 6 cups leftover honey cake, in coarse chunks
6 eggs
2 tsp. pure vanilla extract
pinch salt
1 cup sugar
1/2 cup unsalted butter, melted
1 1/2 cups evaporated milk or half and half
2 tbsp. all-purpose flour
1 tsp. baking powder

To serve, use sour cream, or dusting of confectioners' sugar or a drizzle of half-and-half or (if you are ambitious) crème anglaise.

Preheat the oven to 350. Generously spray a 3- to 4-quart oven-proof casserole or serving dish with nonstick cooking spray.

Whisk all the ingredients (except the honey cake) in a large bowl.

Place the honey cake chunks in the baking dish and pour the egg mixture over it, making sure all the chunks are coated. Bake 35 to 45 minutes until the custard just begins to brown. Serve hot, warm, cold or at room temperature with sour cream or cream. Cut in squares to serve. (Freezes well or stays 3 days in the fridge – you can also prepare it, refrigerate it and bake it just before you require it.) Serves 6 to 8.

Plan fuss-free dinner

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Rosh Hashanah is almost here. It is said that the way you enter Rosh Hashanah is the way you will enter Shabbat and chagim for the coming year. Our best, perhaps new, clothes are clean and ready. Our homes are immaculate and smell of furniture polish. The table is set with a gleaming white tablecloth, beautiful dishes and silverware. The candlesticks have been polished, delicious smells emanate from the kitchen, and we're sitting down to relax while the home-baked challah is rising.

Oh, that this were true for all of us! Is that calm and organization a fairy tale, or are there really people who manage to live like that?

There definitely are people like that, and I wish I were one of them! Unfortunately, I'm not. I must admit that it took me 20-odd years of making holidays to get myself to the point where I could greet the holiday with some semblance of organization and calm.

Here are some quick and easy recipes that will delight your family and guests, and no one will ever know how easy they were – unless you tell. They are all sweet in keeping with the tradition of serving sweet dishes for a sweet new year. Fill in your menu with simple salads and lightly steamed vegetables.

HONEY-GARLIC CHICKEN

1/2 cup honey
1/4 cup soy sauce
4 tbsp. brown sugar
2 cloves garlic, crushed, or 1/2 tsp. garlic powder
1/2 tsp. paprika
pepper to taste
2 chickens, quartered (skinned if desired)

Mix together all ingredients, except chicken, in a small bowl. Place chicken quarters in a roasting pan and pour sauce over chicken. Bake, uncovered, at 350 for 1-1/2 hours. Makes 8 servings.

BRISKET IN A BAG

This is my own variation of a recipe from Norene's Healthy Kitchen by Norene Gilletz.

1 5-lb. brisket
1/2 cup white wine
1/4 cup apricot jam
2 tbsp. maple syrup or honey
1/4 cup bottled sweet and sour sauce
2 tbsp. soy sauce
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. fresh ground black pepper
1 tsp. paprika
3 cloves garlic, minced

Rinse the brisket well and trim off excess fat. In a large re-sealable plastic bag, combine the brisket with the remaining ingredients and seal tightly. Marinate for up to 2 days in the refrigerator or up to 4 months in the freezer.

If frozen, when ready to cook, thaw frozen meat in the refrigerator for 24 hours. Preheat oven to 350. Spray a large baking dish with cooking spray. Empty contents of bag into the baking dish and bake, uncovered for about 4 hours or until tender.

שאט נפש

לפני שבועיים התפייטתי כאן והתפעמתי מזה שנער אילתי צנוע זכה במדליה אולימפית, וגם הבעתי את שמחתי שדווקא אילת שבאמת זקוקה לקצת שמחה, זוכה לה.

שעת נפש

שיחלים

הינה רשימה חלקית של תכונות ישראליות שאולי כדאי לנו לחשוב עליהן טוב טוב לקראת השנה החדשה. תודה לרחוי זוהר:

"ישראלים לוקחים עשר שקיות ניילון מהמתקן שבסופר- שיהיה בבית. לכל ישראלי יש ילד שיודע יותר טוב מהמורה שלו.

ישראלים רואים שלט "צבע טרי", מניחים את היד ואומרים: "וואלה, באמת צבע טרי".

ישראלים שומעים כרוז משטרתי: "האזרחים מתבקשים שלא להתקרב לאזור" ומיד רצים לשם בהמוניהם.

ישראלים שואלים "מי האחרון בתור?", אומרים "אני אחריך" והולכים לעסוקיהם.

ישראלים תמיד הכירו בילדותם מישהו שכעת הוא מפורסם, והם תמיד ישמחו לספר לך איזה אפס הוא היה.

ישראלים חושבים כולם שהמדינה על הפנים, אבל יקראו "אנטישמי" לכל מי שמעז להשמיץ אותה, במיוחד אם הוא יהודי.

הישראלים שידעים איך לפתור את הסכסוך במזרח התיכון עובדים כולם כנהגי מוניות".

אוד לשאון נפש

יותי שלחה לי את הקטע הבא, שגם הוא נוגע לחשבון הנפש של הימים הנוראים:

בהתחלה מתתי לסיים עממי ולהתחיל תיכון.
אחר כך מתתי לסיים תיכון ולהתגייס לצבא,
אחר כך מתתי לסיים את הצבא ולהתחיל לעבד,
אחר כך מתתי להתחתן
ואחר כך מתתי לגדל ילדים
ואחר כך מתתי לצאת לפנסיה,
ועכשיו אני מתי
.....ומגלה פתאום ששכחתי לחיות.....

Olmert resigns but offers to help Livni

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli President Shimon Peres was expected Monday to ask Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni to try to form a new coalition government, the president's spokesperson Ayelet Frish said the day after Prime Minister Ehud Olmert resigned.

On Monday, Peres consulted various Knesset leaders about their preferences for prime minister, and to check if they wanted an early election, prior to the national ballot due in 2010.

The political uncertainty has dimmed even further the prospects for an Israeli-Palestinian peace deal, which the United States had hoped Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas could achieve this year.

Olmert, who could face indictment in corruption probes, submitted his resignation to Peres on Sunday, but will remain in office until a new government is formed or until it is determined that agreement on a new coalition cannot be reached before new general elections are held.

He was replaced as the head of the ruling Kadima party by Livni, who narrowly won an internal election last Wednesday.

If Peres gives her the nod, she will have 42 days to build a coalition and become Israel's first woman prime minister since Golda Meir in the 1970s. Failure would likely lead to a parliamentary election.

Labor party leader Ehud Barak, Israel's defence minister, told reporters he wants a broad-based government that would include left- and right-wing parties.

"What Israel really needs for the challenges it faces is a national emergency government," said Barak, whose party is a key member of Olmert's coalition.

Livni met late Sunday with Barak to negotiate a possible governing alliance.

Olmert submitted his letter of resignation to President Shimon Peres at the president's official residence in Jerusalem on Sunday evening, to deliver the letter.

"This is not an easy decision, and I am convinced that this is a difficult evening for him," Peres said following the meeting. "I wish to take this opportunity to thank the prime minister for his service to the people and the state over the course of many years of public activities: as the mayor of Jerusalem, as a minister in the government and as the prime minister of Israel."

At the weekly cabinet meeting Sunday morning, Olmert told his cabinet that he would resign.

"I must say that this was not an easy or simple decision," he said. "I think that I have acted properly and responsibly, as I promised the Israeli public from the beginning."

Olmert congratulated Livni and said he would help her to form a coalition government. Livni has said she plans to form a new government by the start of the winter session on Oct. 27.

Earlier Sunday, Livni told her party's leaders that she plans to set up a new coalition government soon, preferably a national unity government.

But "if it soon becomes clear that a coalition cannot be formed, we will go to elections and we will win," she said.

IAEA meeting in Vienna will focus on Iran, Syria

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Questions about Iran's past nuclear activities and about Syria's alleged secret nuclear program were expected to dominate a meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency's (IAEA) board that opened in Vienna on Monday.

The 35-member IAEA board of governors is set to discuss Iran's lack of co-operation in explaining reports that the international nuclear watchdog says could be related to an effort to develop nuclear weapons.

Iran strongly denies that it ever intended to use nuclear technology for military purposes.

Reports that Iran has made nuclear warheads are "totally baseless" and "not in line with our national interests," Hossein Salami, a general of Iran's revolutionary guards, said on Sunday, according to Iranian news agency IRNA.

IAEA director general Mohamed ElBaradei wrote in his latest report on Iran that his inspectors had not found evidence of weapons being manufactured. However, several IAEA reports have pointed to indications of an Iranian atom bomb effort, including a blueprint for a nuclear warhead obtained by Tehran, and work on the modification of Shahab-3 missiles that points to nuclear use.

As Iran has neither heeded the call of the United Nations Security Council to answer outstanding questions, nor agreed to halt its uranium enrichment program, Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States, as well as Germany, met Friday in Washington to discuss a possible new Security Council resolution.

While the United States, the European Union and others are expected to make strong statements at the IAEA board meeting condemning Iran's position, a resolution in Vienna is unlikely, according to diplomats.

On Monday, ElBaradei was set to give board members an interim report on Syria, which is suspected of having secretly built a nuclear reactor, possibly with North Korean help.

IAEA inspectors took samples in June at the alleged site, which was bombed by Israeli warplanes last year. Diplomats said last week that results were still outstanding and no final assessment would be possible unless Syria gives the IAEA access to further sites.

Lost capital of Jewish Khazar kingdom found

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Russian archeologists said last week that they have found the long-lost capital of the Khazar kingdom in southern Russia, a breakthrough for research on the medieval Jewish state.

"This is a hugely important discovery," expedition organizer Dmitry Vasilyev told AFP by telephone from Astrakhan State University after returning from excavations near the village of Samosdelka, just north of the Caspian Sea.

"We can now shed light on one of the most intriguing mysteries of that period – how the Khazars actually lived. We know very little about the Khazars – about their traditions, their funerary rites, their culture," he said.

The city was the capital of the Khazars, a semi-nomadic Turkic people who adopted Judaism as a state religion, from between the eighth and the 10th centuries, when it was captured and sacked by the rulers of ancient Russia.

At its height, the Khazar state and its tributaries controlled much of what is now southern Russia, western Kazakhstan, eastern Ukraine, Azerbaijan and large parts of Russia's North Caucasus region.

The capital is referred to as Itil in Arab chronicles, but Vasilyev said the word may actually have been used to refer to the Volga River on which the city was founded or to the surrounding river delta region.

Itil was said to be a multi-ethnic place with houses of worship and judges for Christians, Jews, Muslims and pagans. Its remains have until now never been identified and were said to have been washed away by the Caspian Sea.

Archeologists have been excavating in the area of Samosdelka for the past nine years, but have only now collected enough material evidence to back their thesis, including the remains of a brick fortress, he added.

"Within the fortress, we have found huts similar to yurts, which are characteristics of Khazar cities… The fortress had a triangular shape and was made with bricks. It's another argument that this was no ordinary city."

Ten university archeologists and some 50 students took part in excavations in the region this past summer, which are partly financed by the Jewish University in Moscow and the Russian Jewish Congress.

Anti-Semitic, anti-Muslim feelings grow worldwide: survey

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Anti-Muslim and anti-Jewish feelings are rising in several major European countries, according to a worldwide survey released last week.

The Washington-based Pew Research Center's global attitude survey found that most Muslims in countries where they are in the majority worry about the rise of Islamic extremism at home and abroad. Majorities held that view in Indonesia, Pakistan, Tanzania, Lebanon, Egypt, Jordan and Nigeria.

Large numbers of respondents in several Muslim countries also identified struggles within their countries between people who want to modernize the society and those dedicated to maintaining fundamentalist practices of Islam.

Regarding respondents' attitudes toward Jews, Britain was the survey's only European country to report no significant increase in anti-Jewish attitudes.

Just under one in 10 British respondents held those views. Similar numbers of Americans reported negative views of Jews during those same years.

The non-partisan Pew Research Center public opinion conducts polls that chart trends in values and political and social attitudes, as well as surveys that measure public attentiveness to major news stories.

It provides information on the issues, attitudes and trends shaping America and the world, the 2008 survey says. The global attitudes project began in 2001.

The latest poll found that half or more of respondents in Spain and Germany rated Muslims unfavourably: 50 per cent in Germany, compared with 46 per cent in 2004; and 52 per cent in Spain, compared with 37 per cent in 2005 and 60 per cent in 2006. Muslim terrorists bombed a commuter train in Madrid on March 11, 2004, and killed 191 people, modern Europe's deadliest terror attack.

Again, the United States and Britain had the fewest respondents holding negative views of Muslims, both 23 per cent. In Britain, that was up from 18 per cent in 2004, and it was down in the United States from 31 per cent in 2004.

The survey found that people who held anti-Jewish and anti-Muslim views tended to be older and less educated than those who did not. Surveyors bundled France, Germany and Spain, the western European countries where such views were most common, to draw a picture of those holding ethnic-based negative attitudes. They found that most anti-Semitic people were also anti-Muslim.

People ages 50 and older express more negative views of both Jews and Muslims than do those younger than 50, the survey said. Similarly, Europeans who have not attended university are consistently more likely than those who have to hold unfavourable opinions of both groups. They also tend to support the political right in Europe, it said.

The survey also said positive attitudes toward Osama bin Laden have declined in several countries, but the Al Qaeda leader still enjoys high support in Nigeria, Indonesia and Pakistan.

The survey found much more positive views prevailed in most places about Christians.

In some countries, however, unfavourable views of Christians have surged during the last four years, the survey said. One of those places is Turkey, a Muslim country with a democratic political system where unfavourable views of Christians have accompanied a rise in unfavourable attitudes about Jews.

These are some other findings.

• Despite the increase in anti-Jewish sentiment in Europe, the deepest resentment of Jews exists outside Europe, especially where Muslims predominate. Favourable opinions of Jews rank in the single digits in Turkey, Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon and Pakistan.

• Jordan, where close to two million Palestinians live, many as citizens, is the only predominantly Muslim country surveyed that had a positive view of the Palestinian group Hamas. Hamas controls Gaza, but the United States considers it an international terror group.

• France is the most secular country in the survey. Only 10 per cent of French respondents said religion was very important in their lives, and 60 per cent said they never pray.

• France also had the highest percentage with favourable opinions of Jews, at 79 per cent. The United States had 77 per cent, Britain and Australia 73 per cent.

The Pew survey was conducted during varying periods from March 17 to April 21 in 24 countries. Telephone interviews were used in seven countries and face-to-face interviews in 17. Local languages were used.

The number interviewed ranged from 700 in Australia to 3,212 in China. All samples were conducted nationally, except in Brazil, China, India and Pakistan, where samples were largely urban. The margins of sampling error was plus or minus two percentage points in India and China, and was either three or four points in the other countries.

Latest Paris attack renews hate debate

By DEVORAH LAUTER
JTA

PARIS — The father of one of the latest Jewish beating victims in the French capital's 19th district has no plans to leave his home anytime soon.

Nor does he have any intention of asking his son Dan to hide his religious identity.

The 17-year-old and two other teens were wearing kippot when they were beaten Sept. 6 on the same street as another Jewish teen in June. The victims suffered minor fractures and bruises.

Speaking to JTA at the computer software company where he works, the father, Thierry, who asked that his last name not be used for security reasons, said he refuses to "let them stop us from living."

Anti-Semitism in not new to the 19th district, the northeastern area of Paris that's home to the city's largest Jewish community – some 30,000 people – made up mostly of low-income, Orthodox Jews. France has western Europe's largest Jewish population, approximately 600,000.

Some Jewish activists here were initially optimistic that the latest attack – which French officials immediately attributed to racism – would help shift the analysis of ethnic tensions in the poor, immigrant-heavy neighbourhood.

This summer's string of violence intensified a debate over whether anti-Jewishness is a deeply rooted problem among youths in the working-class district or whether random Jewish-vs.-Muslim gang violence instigated by outsiders from nearby ghettos is to blame for ethnic tensions and is being overblown by skittish French Jews.

"We're at a crossroads," said Raphael Haddad, 26, president of the French Student Union, UEJF. "Today there are these two theses being debated in France, and our work is to show what is due to racist crime and what is based on simply gang violence."

Since last week, however, racist motives for the incident are in doubt, because police sources reported that one suspect was Jewish. Now officials and the Jewish community, which was also quick to label the attack anti-Semitic, are facing questions from a skeptical French public.

The skepticism no doubt grew last Sept. 17 when Paris prosecutors said the teens were not attacked because of anti-Semitism. Five of the six suspects questioned in the assault were indicted for group "voluntary violence," the French Press Agency reported. The suspects are aged 16 to 23.

"Did the political world and the organizational milieu lack caution?" the Le Monde daily asked Sept. 17.

The same article quoted spokespeople from the Paris mayor's office and the interior minister's office saying they had made their conclusions based on police information given to them. Prosecutors have maintained that anti-Semitism played a role in the June assault of Rudy Haddad.

When anti-Semitic incidents rose sharply between 2000 and 2004, at the height of tensions between Israel and the Palestinians, the atmosphere was often likened to the horrors of the World War II era, sparking sensitivity among the French.

That tone of skepticism sometimes turns into hostility toward French Jews, who already face accusations of pushing their own agenda at the expense of other minorities, and of presumably influencing the government.

"Because of systematically crying wolf, the Jews risk to lose all credit," said one reader comment on the moderate-left daily Liberation website. It was one of hundreds of such postings about the revelation that one of the suspected attackers was Jewish.

The 19th district suffers from a high degree of violent crime in general. But Jewish leaders and most of the district's Jews vehemently deny the gang-violence argument, often heard after Haddad, 17, was attacked in June. Haddad ended up in a coma. Prosecutors in that case are charging two young men of "attempted murder and group violence aggravated by their anti-Semitic character."

Thierry is exasperated by the notion that the incidents stem from gang violence.

"These gangs don't exist – all that is just a media circus," he told JTA. He cited a French TV report quoting the secretary of the National Police Union as saying the Sept. 6 incident "might not be anti-Semitic but just a settling of scores between gangs."

Yet despite such reports, in the first days following the latest crime, many officials and the media suggested the recent attack appeared different from the one on Haddad mainly because the victims – one in law school, and all in rigorous academic programs – did not appear involved in interethnic skirmishes.

More Falash Mora will be allowed

Israel will allow additional Ethiopians to petition for aliyah under special circumstances. Without specifying a number, the cabinet decided that the petitioners must meet three key criteria: they must be listed on a 1999 census of the Falash Mora in Ethiopia; have been living for at least a year in the Ethiopian city of Gondar, where Jewish aid groups have provided services; and have relatives in Israel who can submit formal petitions on their behalf. At least 1,400 Ethiopians are expected to meet those criteria, and possibly as many as 8,700. The move follows months of pressure on the Israeli government by advocates of Ethiopian aliyah, including North American Jewish federation executives. The Falash Mora are Ethiopians who claim links to Ethiopians whose Jewish ancestors converted to Christianity a century ago to escape economic and social pressures, but who now are returning to Judaism and petitioning to immigrate to Israel. Immigrants found eligible will be brought at a rate of up to 100 per month. A total of 16,095 Ethiopians have immigrated to Israel since Israel decided in February 2003 to bring additional Ethiopian olim.

Gaza infighting kills 11

Hamas forces in Gaza raided the compound of a powerful Palestinian clan, killing at least 11 people. Several clan members, including an infant, a Hamas police officer and a young boy caught in the crossfire were killed in the clashes last week. The Hamas police raided the family compound of the Doghmush clan, which is connected to both terrorist and criminal organizations, including Al Qaeda. Clan members also have connections with both Hamas and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah. Some clan members were involved in the March 2007 kidnapping of BBC reporter Alan Johnston, who was held for four months, Reuters reported.

Iraqi lawmaker punished

Iraq's parliament has punished a Sunni lawmaker who visited Israel. The parliamentary immunity of Mithal al-Alousi was lifted, making him subject to prosecution. He also has been banned from traveling outside of Iraq and from attending parliamentary sessions. Speaking Sept. 10 at a conference on terror in Herzliya, Alousi called for stronger cooperation between Iraq and Israel in fighting terror. The Iraqi legislator visited Israel in 2004 to participate in a counterterrorism conference, after which his two grown sons were murdered by extremists as apparent payback.

Maharal Institute opens in Prague

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PRAGUE — The Jewish community in the Czech capital, Prague, has opened a new institute dedicated to the work of 16th-century Rabbi Judah Loew.

Rabbi Loew, also known as the Maharal of Prague, is considered one of the greatest Jewish scholars, philosophers and an authority on Talmud.

He lived between 1525 and 1609, and is remembered for having created a clay figure known as the Golem, which he is said to have brought to life to protect Prague's Jewish community from attacks.

Dedicated to rabbi who created Golem character

Rabbi Loew's tombstone at Prague's Jewish cemetery is visited by thousands of people every year.

The purpose of the Maharal Institute would be to familiarize the public, Jews and non-Jews, with the writings, the ideas, the work of Maharal, Rabbi Manis Barash said at the Sept. 18 opening ceremony in Prague.

"The Maharal's teaching, his ideas are alive today like they were 400 years ago," he said.

Rabbi Barash came to the Czech Republic 12 years ago from New York City to establish the Chabad Lubavitch movement in Prague. It was his idea to set up the new institute.

The institute will serve as a rabbinical college for 10 full time students – with the first group coming from Israel, South America and the United States – for a one-year program studying Talmud and Jewish law with emphasis on the Rabbi Loew's work, Rabbi Barash said.

"The institute will also invite scholars from other countries to give lectures on the Maharal's teaching," Rabbi Barash said.

"The Jewish past was very rich here [in Prague]," he said, adding that the institute will try to bring some of that rich past into the present and into the future.

Nearly 120,000 Jews lived on Czech territory before World War II, but 80,000 did not survive the Holocaust, and the country currently has only a tiny Jewish community of several thousand.

Israel can't avoid clash with Iran, ex-IDF head says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Former Israel Defense Forces chief of staff Moshe Ya'alon said Sunday that Israel won't be able to avoid a military confrontation with Iran, and he called on the international community to stand up to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad like it did to Adolf Hitler and Nazi Germany.

"Today, we in the West are facing the same situation – the lack of decisiveness towards a threat that is no less severe than that which Hitler posed in 1939."

Ya'alon's statements came hours after Ahmadinejad vowed Sunday to stop any attacker before he can "pull the trigger."

In a speech before a military parade on Sunday, Ahmadinejad also said sanctions intended to isolate the Islamic Republic have not worked.

The United States and its allies are seeking to step up UN sanctions on Iran over its disputed nuclear plans, which the West says are a bid to build nuclear arms. Iran denies this.

There has been persistent speculation that the United States or Israel might launch strikes on Iran's nuclear sites, as neither country has ruled out military action if diplomacy fails to end the impasse.

"If anybody dares to offend the boundaries of the Iranian nation, the Iranian nation's holy land and Iran's legal interests, our armed forces… will break his hand before he can pull the trigger," Ahmadinejad said.

He was speaking at a parade broadcast live on state TV to mark the start of the Iran-Iraq war in September 1980. Hundreds of troops then marched in formation past the president's podium.

"Today, Iran is not in a position to show even the smallest flexibility against the bullying of the enemies. History has shown that those who wish ill for Iran will gain nothing but regret," he said.

"The enemies of humanity… had imagined that by military attack and economic and scientific sanctions they could break down our revolution and our nation," he said, adding that Iran's enemies had "lost hope."

Moshe Ya'alon

Iran, the world's fourth-largest oil producer, says it wants to master nuclear technology to make electricity so it can preserve more of its vast oil and gas reserves for export.

But its failure to convince world powers of its peaceful intentions has prompted three rounds of limited UN sanctions. Washington is pushing for a fourth, but China and Russia – two of the five veto-wielding council members – are reluctant.

Iran has dismissed reports of possible U.S. or Israeli plans to strike Iran, but says it would respond by attacking U.S. interests and Israel if any such assault was made.

Jews from Libya request reparations from Italy

JTA

JERUSALEM — Jews of Libyan origin have asked Italy to include them in a $5-billion reparations package.

The package is compensating Libya for Italy's occupation of the country. Italy ruled Libya as a colony from 1911 to 1943.

The Jews of Libyan origin also have asked Libya to compensate them for goods seized after almost all remaining Jews in the country fled widespread persecution in 1967.

Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi and Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi signed the compensation deal Aug. 31.

Meir Cahlon, president of the Israel-based World Organization of Libyan Jews, sent a letter earlier this month to Berlusconi via the Italian ambassador in Israel.

Cahlon said that Libyan Jews "suffered the damages of colonization as did everyone." In addition, he said, they faced further persecution because of Italy's fascist anti-Semitic laws, implemented in 1938. These, he said, led to "losses of jobs, losses of possessions, losses of freedom and losses of human dignity, ending with the deportations to labour and death camps, where 620 Libyan Jews were eliminated."

About 40,000 Jews lived in Libya in 1938, but by the late 1960s the number had dwindled to some 6,000. Virtually all the Jews fled to Israel or Italy in 1967.

'Food rescue' organization feeds needy Israelis

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It's a thought that has crossed everyone's mind at one point or another when attending a function where the food supply seems endless and even excessive: what will be done with all the leftovers?

In most cases, food that's left at the end of the night at weddings, bar mitzvahs and restaurants is simply discarded, going to waste.

But almost six years ago, Joseph Gitler was motivated to change this phenomenon and "rescue" good, nutritious food that could be redirected to social service organizations in Israel.

Today, Gitler, a 33-year-old oleh from New York who began his career in law and then worked in the software industry, is CEO of Table to Table, a non-profit umbrella organization that facilitates donations of surplus food to more than 150 soup kitchens, homeless shelters, senior citizen centres and other social service organizations throughout Israel.

Gitler said he was moved to act after reading in Israeli newspapers about the growing number of single mothers sending their children to school without food and about families living under the poverty line, unable to afford regular, nutritious meals.

He explained that over the last 10 to 15 years, Israel has become westernized and more capitalistic, which has led to more western-style poverty.

"We're not talking about African poverty here, we're not talking about the Sudanese or Ethiopians," Gitler said during one of his periodic visits to Toronto, where he also works for IKO Industries, his family's business.

"We're talking about people who are pressed for money because of bad financial decisions, people going through difficult times, on drugs, going through divorce and as a result are not able to buy the right foods."

When Gitler first looked into the issue, he didn't have long-term plans to tackle the problem. He was just trying to find ways he could help.

"I called up local catering companies in Israel and said, 'If there is someone who is willing to pick up the leftovers at night, pack it up, and take care of everything... would you be interested?' Ninety nine per cent of the responses were, 'Where have you been?'"

He said he started out transporting food in his car. He bought a couple refrigerators for his garage and stored the food until he could deliver them to social service agencies near his home in Ra'anana.

"I realized that when it came to 'food rescue,' there wasn't much going on in Israel. There is a very strong NGO culture, but in this particular area, I don't want to say nothing was going on, but no one was thinking big," Gitler said.

In an effort to see what he could do to address the need, he made contact with a Toronto-based organization called Second Harvest, which picks up excess food from restaurants and catering companies and delivers it to local social service agencies.

In April 2003, he spent a week at Second Harvest, meeting with employees and board members to get a sense of how they operated.

Table to Table volunteers do a night-time pickup at a major Tel Aviv shopping mall, where many restaurants donate their leftover food at the end of the day.

Later that year, Table to Table was founded, and five years later, it has grown to employ nearly 50 people and makes use of about 5,000 volunteers each month. With a an annual budget of $3 million, it "rescues" more than 750,000 meals and 3,000 tons of fresh produce each year.

Table to Table, which relies on funding from private donors and Jewish federations, has a number of programs that allow staff and volunteers to provide its client social service agencies with most, and in some cases, all, of their food.

Table to Table volunteers use their own cars to collect food from bar mitzvahs, weddings, restaurants, bakeries and other catered venues, and deliver it directly to non-profit organizations or to Table to Table's warehouses to deliver the following day.

During the day, volunteers use Table to Table's seven refrigerated trucks to transport food from army bases and corporate cafeterias to the needy.

Table to Table also has a Sandwiches for Schoolkids program to help Israeli children who live below the poverty line. Each school day, volunteers deliver more than 4,400 mid-morning meals to students at 70 schools around Israel.

These refrigerated trucks and vans are part of Table to Table's fleet of vehicles that transport food from donors and farms to a warehouse, or directly to social service agencies.

As well, the organization's Project Leket capitalizes on the fact that some farmers can't pick their entire crop before it begins to rot, or find it unprofitable to pick the whole crop due to low market prices.

Israeli farmers invite Table to Table volunteers to harvest their fields and donate whatever they can glean to the needy.

Gitler spoke enthusiastically about one of his newest projects, which is a "paid pickers project."

"We noticed that there was so much more in the fields we weren't getting to, despite having about 4,000 or 5,000 volunteers every month."

He said after placing a notice that he was looking to employ 20 paid pickers, the only people that responded were Israeli-Arab women.

"Most of these women have never had a job in their lives where they weren't getting screwed. They get paid 15 per cent above minimum wage, they're regular employees and they don't get fired when the tomato season is over," he said.

Working full time, "these 20 women pick three to four times as much as 5,000 volunteers. In the month of July, our [part-time] volunteers picked about 50 tons, and these women picked about 150 tons."

Although it was never his intention, he said Table to Table has been a tremendous example of peaceful co-existence.

"We had an organization that had 25 employees, all Jewish, and suddenly, we have 20 Israeli-Arab employees, and it's been a very positive experience."

Gitler said that one of the most satisfying aspects of his work is that for every dollar that Table to Table spends on gathering food, it provides about $6 worth of food to the needy.

"In 2008, our budget is about $3 million and we expect to bring in about $15-to-$18 million, which is unbelievable," he said, adding that he hopes to double that amount within the next three years.

He also has ambitions to help cities in North America develop "food rescue" organizations.

"In August, I spent some time with a couple of farmers in rural Ontario because my feeling is that when it comes to gleaning... if we can do this much gleaning in Israel, imagine what we could do in Canada or in the States," Gitler said.

Children's musical Marshmallow Island gets a facelift

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Legend of Marshmallow Island, a show that delighted children for the first time nearly three years ago, has had a facelift and will be presented next month in Vaughan, Ont.

Lorne Lampert, the founder and CDO (Chief Drumming Officer) of Mystic Drumz, "a world-music percussion entertainment company," wrote, produced and stars in the one-man interactive show that combines storytelling, musical instruments from around the world, multimedia sets and eco-friendly messages.

The show, which plays at the City Playhouse on Oct. 19, is about a boy who is on a journey to find the legendary island.

"We travel around the world to find a marshmallow island, so it's silly, and we find these characters, little woodland animals, that talk and give us clues, and they're very funny and have their own personalities and attitudes," said Lampert, who has a degree in music education and is a percussionist with an established nine-piece band called King Sunshine.

"It's as interactive as a show can get. You have a stage performer and a theatre, but the audience is asked to get up and dance, clap along – we bring some kids up on stage."

He said that since the première of the show in December 2005, he's done hundreds of private shows at camps, day cares and schools throughout Ontario, but this is the first time he'll be presenting the production to the public.

"This is like version 2.1. It's gone through a lot of changes. For those who might have seen the show three years ago, there is a whole new face on it, new characters, new plot twists, new instruments. It's had a facelift, and it's ready to come out again," he said.

Lampert, who believes that children don't get enough music education in schools, hopes that his show, for children aged three to 11, will pique their interest in music and the arts.

Percussion instruments from South India, Africa and the Middle East are an important part of the show, but now the multimedia aspect of the show shares centre-stage with the instruments.

> As interactive as a show can get

"We have live video recording of different musicians, so that when I travel to India [during the performance], I'm talking to an Indian drummer on the screen. There appears to be more live performers in the show than there are," he said.

"While we're travelling from country to country, the video mixer changes the backdrop so it feels like we're flying on a plane, or that we're on a train, or suddenly we're in a full, lush forest."

Lampert said another aspect of the production that has evolved is the incorporation of eco-education into the story-line.

"It's totally worked into the play, for example, how frogs are bellwethers of nature, and if you see that the frogs are getting sick that means that we should worry. Part of the show talks about the fragility of the ecosystem," he said.

"Not only are we travelling the world trying to find Marshmallow Island, but we're trying to understand the delicacy of the planet," he said, adding that eco-friendly groups have agreed to set up booths in the playhouse lobby to hand out pamphlets and brochures.

Lampert, who was given the opportunity years ago to hone his musical education skills with campers at a Jewish Reform overnight camp in Mississippi, said that children respond to the show because this kind of educational, interactive entertainment is nothing they are used to.

"The attraction is in the realness and grassroots feeling. Too much children's entertainment has become overdrawn and flashy. We are trying to create a reality show for children… It's time to get back to real-life performers entertaining our children," he said.

"We don't talk down to the kids. We treat the kids like they're adults. We're talking to them as real people, and they seem to relate to that."

Lampert has been building his company, Mystic Drumz, for 12 years and is continuing to broaden the reach of his work.

He is working toward creating a pilot for a TV show based on his play and is also putting the finishing touches on five other shows that are meant to make up a series. The next show that he hopes to present is called The Button People.

"We have a few shows all built into this format, which seems to really work with multiple age groups."

Lampert performs two shows on Oct. 19. The first show begins at 11:00 a.m, and is presented by the aliyah chapter of Canadian Hadassah WIZO, in support of the annual One Campaign, which assists children, women and youth at risk in Israel, as well as women and children in Toronto. What A Bagel will be sponsoring a brunch before the show.

The 1:30 p.m. performance is in support of SickKids Foundation. A portion of the proceeds from ticket sales will be donated to the SickKids Foundation, in support of pediatric research.

"By putting [a charity] in the public eye, it reminds people that there are people who aren't as fortunate as we are, and we can come out and have a great day and also help someone out," Lampert said.

For more information or tickets, visit http://www.marshmallowisland.com. Tickets cost $12.50.

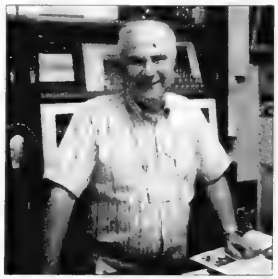
Historic photos of Jerusalem discovered

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — The life of photographer Kevork Kahvedjian changed one day in 1989, when his wife, Hasmig, decided to clean out the attic of their house in the Armenian quarter of Jerusalem's Old City.

There she discovered boxes of negatives of photographs that Kahvedjian's father, Elia, had taken of Jerusalem in the 1920s, '30s, and '40s, before the city's landscape had been transformed by the 1948 War of Independence.



Kevork Kahvedjian

Kahvedjian's father, Elia,was born in Turkey in 1910 and orphaned at the age of five. He was brought to live in Palestine in 1920. He began taking his first photographs of his adopted homeland at the age of 14. In 1947, fearing the coming war for Israel's independence, Elia hid his entire collection and fled the country. The historic photographs remained hidden until some 40 years later, when Kahvedjian and his wife found them.

From the moment the discovery was made, Kahvedjian recognized the rarity of his father's photographs, and realized that his own life's work would be to catalogue and exhibit them.

The photographs won critical acclaim after being exhibited in Jerusalem, New York, San Francisco and elsewhere, and in 1998 Kahvedjian published an exquisite collection of them, Jerusalem Through My Father's Eyes.

During an interview at his studio at 14 Al-Khanqa St. in the Christian quarter of the Old City, 63-year-old Kahvedjian proudly opened the book and pointed to a photograph his father took of the Kotel in 1929. "Look, in the photo you can see that Jewish men and Jewish women are praying together, intermingled. There was no divider separating them like there is now," he said.

Kahvedjian flipped quickly to another photo showing the area of Damascus Gate. "It shows that after 1948, there was actually a physical barrier dividing west and east Jerusalem," he said.

"There is a lot of interest in my father's photos," he added.

Photography is a lifelong passion that Kahvedjian says seems to flow in the family genes. Both his sons are also photographers.

The collection of Elia Kahvedjian's black and white photographs capture the ebb and flow of daily life in Jerusalem, and reflect the eye of an outsider, an Armenian Christian living in the heart of a conflict between Jews and Arabs. The photographs have a sensitivity fostered by the hardships of Elia's own childhood.

"One hundred and sixty members of my father's family were murdered in the Armenian genocide. After weeks in the desert, my father was given to a Kurd that was passing by. The Kurd sold him to a blacksmith, who eventually sent him away," Kahvedjian said.

"He sought refuge in a Syrian convent. When the war was over, [in 1918] the American Near East Relief Foundation began to gather Armenian orphans and distribute them in its orphanages throughout the Middle East.

"My father was sent to an orphanage in Lebanon and then to Nazareth, before arriving at the age of 16 to an orphanage in the Old City. It so happened that one of his teachers in the orphanage in Nazareth was a photographer and started to teach him," Kahvedjian said.

After learning the trade, Elia bought a studio in 1936 on Jaffa Road (which today is the site of the Dan Pearl Hotel). He had some business contacts with the British military, and as a result two British intelligence colonels came to his studio in late 1947 to warn him of a pending Arab riot, after the United Nations vote on Nov. 29, 1947, to partition Palestine. The riot destroyed Jerusalem's new Commercial Center.

The two officers assisted Elia in loading his photographs and equipment onto two trucks and taken to the Armenian convent in the Old City. Two days later, Elia's studio, together with all of Jerusalem's Mamilla area, was ransacked.

Elia and his family sought safety in the convent and then fled to Syria for eight months. He returned to Jerusalem to find it divided between Hashemite Jordan and the newly established State of Israel.

Kahvedjian is currently completing a second volume of his father's photos and has begun cataloguing more than 2,000 negatives his father shot in neighbouring Middle East countries before 1948. His two sons are working on a "then and now" volume, contrasting the changes in Jerusalem that have occurred in the last seven decades.

Creator of Jersey Boys inspired by true story

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

Writing a story revolving around the hit songs of a performer was not initially appealing to Marshall Brickman, who co-wrote the book to the musical Jersey Boys.

"I looked at the many jukebox musicals that have failed – musicals about Elvis, Johnny Cash, Bob Dylan – and wasn't interested in creating another. Although Mamma Mia became a commercial hit, I still wasn't interested in this genre," Brickman said.

The 67-year-old writer and director has earned the right to be choosy. Brickman received an Oscar as screenwriter for his collaboration with director Woody Allen in the film Annie Hall and earned eight other awards over his career for his unique movies, so he did not want to waste his time on a project that didn't have a good story.

"I would not have written Jersey Boys if there was not a compelling story to it. My writing partner, Rick Elice, and I had a chance meeting with Frankie Valli and Bob Gaudio of the Four Seasons and learned how dramatic their lives were, four blue-collar guys from a low-income New York neighbourhood who had been threatened by tough guys and rose to become famous," Brickman said.

"Once I heard their true story, Rick and I knew Jersey Boys would not be another wasted jukebox musical and we were hooked. The dynamics of creating a musical with the stories of four people on the stage would hook an audience."

Although the music of the Four Seasons created nostalgia for the audience, it is Brickman's story of Jersey Boys, with humour laced with drama, that has won the raves of critics. Debuting on Broadway in 2005, Jersey Boys won numerous Tony Awards in 2006, and Brickman and Elice were nominated for a Tony for creating the book for the musical. Jersey Boys is still on Broadway, with a national tour running simultaneously. Toronto box office sales of Jersey Boys are doing so well that the musical has been extended one month through Nov. 9.

Brickman himself is no stranger to music, having played banjo with John and Michelle Phillips in their pre-Mamas and Papas days in 1962-63. He turned to writing comedy in 1964, first with Candid Camera. He went on to become head writer for Johnny Carson on The Tonight Show in the late 60s and then The Dick Cavett Show in 1968. After meeting Allen on Dick Cavett, the duo decided to collaborate and made many famous films in the 1970s.

Associated music teacher pioneers electroclash

By RENA GODFREY
Special to The CJN

Merill Nisker was teaching music at Associated Hebrew Schools in the early 1990s and entertaining children, my own included, at birthday parties.

Today, Nisker is better known as Peaches, the raunchy electronica musician/singer who steps onto the stage in a twinkling, hot-pink sequined brassiere, as her fans go wild, clearly enjoying her in-your-face, sexual, gender-bending lyrics of her songs.

Peaches wasn't always Peaches, and the story of her rise to fame, as one of the pioneers of electroclash – which fuses New Wave and electronic dance music – is as riveting as the forever-young-looking 41-year-old herself.

I've known Merill, as I knew her then, since the late '70s, when she was a tweener, absolutely adorable and the comedian in her family. Peaches was best friends with my little sister, and I was best friends with her older sister.

Many a good time was spent in the Nisker's warm and welcoming home. Always creative, she taught herself to play guitar, and says she "can play many instruments, but not very well."

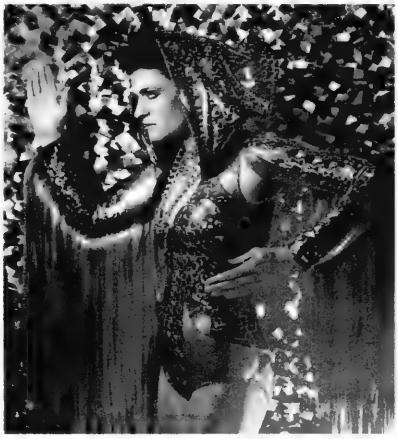
This lack of formal training certainly has not held her back. Peaches is a versatile musician and performer who attracts fans of all ages and cultures. Looking back to her personal and musical roots, it all makes perfect sense how this electroclash phenomenon emerged, yet Merrill confesses she had no plan or agenda.

"It all just happened. I took old-school sounds, mixed it in a machine and taped it." Although at times she's added dancers and a backup band as part of her entourage, Peach's music machine, the Rolland mc-505, is at the centre of her music.

Around the time she was teaching in Toronto at Associated, Peaches was also exploring and experimenting with her own music. In 1995, she produced her first album, Fancypants Hoodlum, under her Nisker name. The "Peaches" persona emerged, pushing her into fame with her unusual, sexually-centred, gender-questioning and thought-provoking music.

She has since produced three albums, the latest, Impeach My Bush, was released in 2006 and features Joan Jett and her former Toronto roommate Feist. She has just completed her fourth album, which is yet to be titled.

Peaches has played with Elastica, Bjork, Marilyn Manson and the Queens of the Stone Age. She has done remixes for many musicians, including Yoko Ono and the B52's, and has guest appearances on albums by Iggy Pop and Pink. She's also just completed an extensive summer DJ tour across Europe.



Peaches [Adam Cohen photo]

She has a huge following worldwide. Even Madonna boasts having a signed pair of Peaches' bikini bottoms.

Peaches lists Diamada Galas, Iggy Pop, Nina Simone, Grace Jones, Bowie and Prince as her favourite artists.

Peaches lives in Berlin with her longtime boyfriend, Connie, who runs several underground music clubs in the Berlin area.

She is proud of an art installation called Peach Pit, exhibited at the Biennale de Montreal in 2007. Peach Pit is a cave constructed out of more than 300 articles of clothing that were thrown on stage during her shows, and covered in human hair. She hopes to be involved in more artistic projects in the future.

Peaches revealed the secret to her success. "I've always stuck to my guns and trusted myself. Making my own album, and inventing my own way," she says.

The best part about doing this interview was recognizing that Peaches is still the highly original Merrill Nisker – unaffected, sweet, extremely bright and articulate. Always questioning, pushing the boundaries, forever evolving... a true artist.

Peaches' website address is www.peachesrocks.com.

Brickman has finished play based on The Addams Family

The premise of several of Allen's movies – Sleeper, Annie Hall among others – revolved around a sentiment to Jewish New York, with the script built on the neurotic, nebbish Allen character looking at the world from his viewpoint, or was it Brickman's?

"Nobody writes a film by himself, so I'll take some of the credit for some of the success of my work with Woody. We both created the jokes and some of the funniest lines in the films, but the character that Woody made famous is his work alone," Brickman said.

He has earned critical praise for other projects he created as a director without Woody Allen, such as The Manhattan Project, a 1986 film about a gifted high school student who decides to construct a nuclear bomb for a national science fair. Brickman credits his Jewish upbringing in New York for his vision.

"I spoke Yiddish growing up with my parents as my parents, Abraham and Pauline, were new immigrants from Poland. My father was involved in politics as a labour organizer, so I had a taste of left-wing politics. I grew up reading a lot, including the works of Shalom Aleichem and other Yiddish writers, so I had a lot of respect for my heritage.

"But I also grew up differently from my parents. My parents were practical and were not initially happy seeing me play the banjo or writing comedy. They thought I should have become an accountant, doctor or lawyer."

Although Brickman wrote films for Hollywood, he chose to reside in New York. He has been married for 30 years to Nina Feinberg, a former ballet director who is now his film editor, and has two daughters – Jessica, 28, and Sophie, 24.

"I lead a very conventional life, quite different than what people think of when you say you work on Hollywood films. I wouldn't have it any other way and made the right decision to live in New York."

Brickman has finished writing scripts with Elice for two other musicals – Turn of the Century, starring Jeff Daniels and Rachel York, and a play based on the television series The Addams Family, starring Nathan Lane and Bebe Neuwirth. Both plays are scheduled to debut within a year.

Jersey Boys is at Toronto Centre for the Arts, 5040 Yonge St. For tickets and showtimes, call 416-872-1111 or go to www.dancaptickets.com.

Just an Ordinary Jew obsesses on the past

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In Oliver Hirschbiegel's deeply meditative, angst-ridden German film, Just an Ordinary Jew, the main character, Emanuel Goldfarb, is anything but run-of-the-mill.

Goldfarb, a cynical Jewish journalist who writes about culture for a newspaper in Germany, delivers a rambling, sometimes incisive monologue in which he bares his soul and explores what it means to be a Jew in a country that conceived and implemented the Holocaust.

The movie is scheduled to be screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Society on Sept. 28 at 4 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

Goldfarb, portrayed by Ben Becker in an impassioned performance, is an obsessive fellow who feels the full weight of his Jewish background.

Rather than merely being tolerated or singled out as an odd creature, Goldfarb wants to be accepted as an ordinary person. He just wants to blend in and start anew.

But that's a tall order, as he himself implicitly concedes.

In the post-Holocaust era, a Jew who leafs through an old family photo album may be engaging in an emotionally wrenching experience if photographs of murdered relatives or friends are found. By contrast, a Christian may come across, say, a dimly remembered fat aunt.

"The pain doesn't go away," says Goldfarb, who is both complex and neurotic.

Launching into related topics, he discusses his parents' decision to return to postwar Germany from exile in Britain and recalls that, as an only child, he was over protected.

Sounds familiar?

Obsessing on the past, Goldfarb observes, "We can't forget," and then suggests that Jews are burdened by history.

"What did we do to deserve the title of 'Chosen People'"? he asks in the next breath.

In passing, Goldfarb makes barbed comments on the connection between Jewish identity and food, the "Shoah business" and the difficulty of being a Jew in Germany after the Holocaust.

By turns weighty and sardonic, Just an Ordinary Jew tries hard to come to terms with contemporary and historical Jewish issues.

It is interesting to a degree, but it is also heavy-going and somewhat repetitive.

Eye on Arts

By BILL GLADSTONE

ARTWORK LOOTED BY NAZIS RETURNED TO JEWISH FAMILY

Cornelia Muggenthaler, a European researcher and genealogist whose company helps restore Nazi-era art to the heirs of the original owners, says she is deeply impressed by the "moral approach" of one art collector who has insisted upon returning an artwork that the original owner was forced to sell under duress some 70 years ago.

Last spring, Dr. Michael Venator learned of the dubious provenance of a pencil drawing by Adolf von Menzel that he had acquired some years earlier. The former owner, he found, was Alfred Sommerguth, a prominent Jewish businessman who had headed a large tobacco firm in Berlin before World War II. Venator voluntarily returned the work to the family and graciously refused an offer of reimbursement amounting to his purchase price, plus interest.

By 1939, Sommerguth had amassed an eclectic art collection of 106 works, including Dutch and Italian Renaissance masterpieces, as well as works by various French Impressionists. In February 1939, most of the collection was sold at auction and the proceeds confiscated by the Nazis to pay the discriminatory taxes they had levied on the family. The Sommerguths fled to Cuba in 1941 with barely a cent and eventually immigrated to New York.

In a letter to Muggenthaler, Venator wrote: "As a German in such a case, I cannot invoke the statute of limitations. How should I calculate? One minute of Alfred and Gertrud Sommerguth's fear of death against 10 hours of the statute of limitations? No, I cannot do that. I have to give back the painting."

Muggenthaler and lawyer Joel Levi, who has represented the Sommerguth heirs for many years, describe the return of the drawing as an "extraordinary" gesture. "In most cases, private collectors are unaware that they are in possession of Nazi-looted art until they are approached by the original owners or their heirs, at which point restitution discussions ensue," Muggenthaler said, adding that during her lengthy career she had never before encountered a case in which the private collector instigated the restitution process.

Police procedural set in New York immigrant neighbourhoods

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Richard Price is a novelist of big city life, an expert dramatist who throws the voices of New Yorkers from the suburbs, the Projects and the last holdout immigrant pockets of Manhattan's Lower East Side.

Norman Ravvin

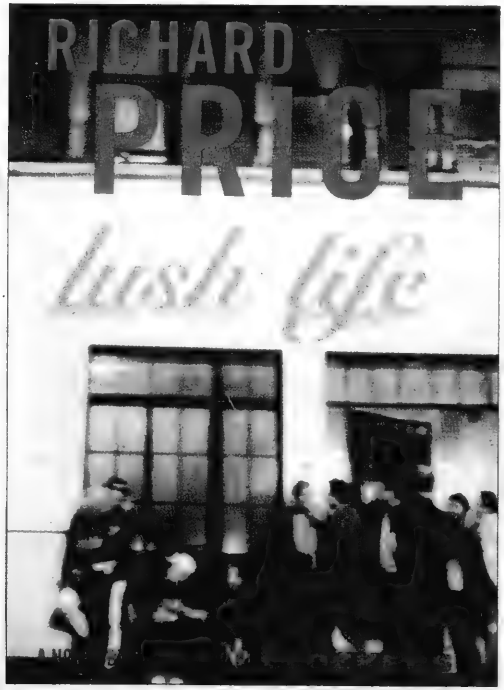
His new novel, Lush Life (Farrar, Straus and Giroux), is that uncommon thing, a mix of high and low, of remarkable literary style and street savvy. It is also up-to-date, detailing recent events like the bizarre collapse of a century-old synagogue roof. Aspects of the novel may remind readers of the sharp-edged dialogue Price writes for the TV miniseries The Wire. His dialogue is eminently playable, and it raises in the reader an unusual urge to reread scenes immediately and sink deeper into the peculiarities, the tension, the care with which his characters' talk is rendered.

Lush Life opens with a chance encounter, late at night on Eldridge Street, which ends in murder. Police attention turns to a hapless would-be screenwriter-cum-restaurant manager named Eric Cash who thinks of himself this way: "He was an upstate Jew five generations removed from here, but he knew where he was, he got the joke; the laboratorio del gelati, the Tibetan hat boutiques, 88 Forsyth House with its historically restored cold-water flats not all that much different from the unrestored tenements that surrounded it."

Cash is not the stereotypic Lower Manhattan striver. He recognizes the new energies and trends that give his part of Manhattan "its nowness, its right here and nowness," but he is also aware that upon first moving to the Lower East Side he was "seized with the notion" of its being haunted by "traces of the 19-century Yiddish boomtown."

Cash winds up a dupe in the unwinding of the novel's crime investigation, a punishing effort by two reasonably well-meaning cops to break him down in order to get a confession. The outcome of this treatment is an overall personal collapse, as Cash is shunned by friends and abandoned to weather the storm of nasty TV and newspaper coverage of the crime. For the reader, Cash proves an adept guide through the ironies of changing New York. He straddles two worlds – one informed by the past, the other filled with businessmen on the make and would-be art bohemians – and he's weary enough with his own pursuits to find that "even on a sun-splashed October morning like this, all of this ethnohistorical mix 'n' match was, much like himself, getting old."

There is no nostalgia in Lush Life. Price's portraits of Jewish ghosts all relate to contemporary lives, architectural trends, and the broader picture he means to convey regarding how certain New York neighbourhoods welcome wave after wave of immigrants. Walking the edges of the novel's crime scene are largely mute Chinese newcomers, mistrustful of any contact with the police, sleeping on bunks rented by the week in communal walk-ups reminiscent of the places early Italian and Jewish families staked out a hundred years before on Mott or Mulberry Street.



As the police close in, almost haphazardly, on the real murderer, Price's narrative moves ever more intimately jnto the downtown Projects where the killer lives. These scenes are American in a new way, delineating gang life and the hip-hop attitude of youth who present an exotic alternative to both mainstream urban life and the city's immigrant past. They are the New Yorkers whose travails and culture have replaced what Price calls the "evicted ghosts – pauperish tenants, greenhorn parishioners" of immigrant New York. Oddly enough, it is the police who create a link between one closed-off part of downtown life with its neighbours.

For Price, the tried-and-true genre of police procedural is a source of suspense, violent confrontation and hard-bitten characters who ooze professional and personal defeat. But Lush Life breaks with that genre through its smart and subtle infusion of history, shifting cultural trends and a darkly philosophical view of big city life. It is a book whose pleasures are many and varied.

Norman Ravvin's books include the novel Lola by Night and A House of Words: Jewish Writing, Identity and Memory. He is chair of Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Israel & the Jewish World

Holocaust prevents criticism of Israel, Tutu says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — South African Nobel Peace laureate Archbishop Desmond Tutu last week accused the West of complicity in Palestinian suffering by its silence, suggesting it did not want to criticize Israel because of the Holocaust.

Tutu spoke after delivering a report to the United Nations about Israel's deadly shelling of the town of Beit Hanoun in Gaza in November 2006, which he said may constitute a war crime.

He criticized the international community for failing to speak out against the suffering in Gaza, home to 1.5 million Palestinians, under an Israeli blockade.

"This silence begets complicity," he told the UN Human Rights Council.

Tutu later told a news conference: "I think the West, quite rightly, is feeling contrite, penitent, for its awful connivance with the Holocaust."

"The penance is being paid by the Palestinians. I just hope again that ordinary citizens in the West will wake up and say 'We refuse to be part of this,'" he said.

The Geneva-based Human Rights Council last week debated the report on his fact-finding mission conducted last May, which called for an independent investigation into the Israeli strike that killed 19 Palestinians, all but one from the same family.

The Israeli military, after carrying out its own investigation, said in February that it had directed artillery fire against the Beit Hanoun area on Nov. 8, 2006, on the basis of intelligence that militants were planning rocket attacks.

Israeli Ambassador Aharon Leshno Yaar told the council on Sept. 18: "A thorough internal investigation was conducted and the results of this investigation shared with the United Nations. Nothing can be gained by rehashing this topic now."

But Tutu, who won the 1985 Nobel Peace Prize for his non-violent struggle against apartheid in his homeland, said his mission never had access to the internal Israeli report.

It was regrettable that Israel had not co-operated with his team, although it admitted responsibility for the strike.

"No verifiable explanation has been offered, no independent impartial and transparent investigation has been held, no one has been held to account," Tutu said.

In talks with senior Hamas officials, Tutu said he demanded an end to the firing of rockets into Israel, saying Hamas has an obligation to respect international humanitarian law.

"Families living in Sderot have the right to live without the fear of rockets, however crude, dropping from the sky," he said.

Israel and the West tightened restrictions on Gaza last year in an attempt to isolate Hamas after its fighters seized the territory. The Islamist group opposed Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' peace talks with Israel.

Time to play the NFL Jewish name game

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Goldberg, Gould, and Bloom not Jewish? There goes the name-game out the window – at least when it comes to identifying NFL athletes by their surnames.

Identifying Jews, whether in the movies or on the playing field, has always been a challenging task, especially when for a variety of reasons they have opted to change their names. For instance, did you know that Lee Grant's real name was Lyova Geisman? Or that Jane Seymour was Joyce Penelope Frankenburg; that comedian George Burns's true moniker was Nathan Birnbaum; and that Bobby Zimmerman became Bob Dylan? Go figure.

Identifying Jews in the National Football League is no walk in the park these days, either. But it has less to do with name-altering than it has to do with defining "Who is a Jew?"

Liberal, Conservative, and Orthodox Jews all have their own criteria for defining who is Jewish, and that often leads to confusion, especially when some of today's athletes are of mixed parentage. It is, of course, less of a dilemma if a player has a Jewish mother, but even then, there is always the possibility of parental conversion (and thus more debate). Consider also that a child may never have been raised as a Jew, regardless of the religion of the child's mother or father.

A reporter can easily be led astray. Take last year, for instance, when I concluded that Adam Goldberg, a linebacker with the St. Louis Rams was Jewish, when in fact only his father was and Goldberg was raised in his mother's Christian faith.

Nate Bloom, a prominent U.S. columnist who writes about Jewish celebrities, also made clear to me that kicker Robbie Gould of the Chicago Bears is not Jewish, and that recently cut Pittsburgh Steelers' wide receiver Jeremy Bloom has a Jewish father, but that Jeremy was primarily raised by his mom and became a devout Christian in high school.

So, taking into account the aforementioned pitfalls, let's examine the pro football class of 2008.

The San Diego Chargers boast a pair of players who have a Jewish connection.

David Binn, 36, the son of a Jewish father, is a 15-year veteran who is the all-time Charger leader in career games played. The team's long snapper, who stands 6-3 and weighs 225 pounds, played college ball at the University of California, Berkeley, where he was also a linebacker. Binn, with his speed, can also cover on punts and is the last remaining player from San Diego's lone Super Bowl team. He was honoured with a spot on the 2007 Pro Bowl team.

His teammate, defensive end Igor Olshansky, 26, is the first Russian-born player in the NFL. The 2004 second-round draft pick (number 35 overall) has a Jewish day school background and is married to a Jewish woman. The 6-6, 309-pound graduate of the University of Oregon played in all 16 games last year and was even a starter in his rookie season. He sports two Star of David tattoos and has been described as possessing a combination of size, speed and brains. Also, his bench pressing skills are such that he has been described as being "as strong as an ox."

Center/guard Lennie Friedman, 31, of the Cleveland Browns is 6-3 and weighs in at 295 pounds. The 10-year-NFL veteran, who is a Duke graduate, played in all 16 Browns' games in 2007. The second-round pick by the Denver Broncos has also donned a uniform for the Redskins and Bears. In 2004, Friedman was inducted into the National Jewish Sports Hall of Fame and Museum.

Punter Adam Podlesh, 25, was a 2007 fourth-round draft pick of the Jacksonville Jaguars. He played in all 16 games in his rookie season. The 5-11, 198-pound kicker, who averaged 41.6 yards last year, is described as being "good at pinning it close to the goal line," which of course gives the Jaguars advantageous field position following punts. Already, the Maryland Terrapins' graduate has been elected to the Rochester, N.Y., Jewish Sports Hall of Fame.

Sage Rosenfels, 30, a backup quarterback with the Houston Texans, is the son of a Jewish father. Drafted by the Washington Redskins, the 6-4, 225-pound fourth round pick in 2001 played his college ball at Iowa State. While Texans' signal caller Matt Schaub is supposedly No. 1, coach Gary Kubiak labeled Rosenfels as 1A. Rosenfels, who yearns to be the starter, reportedly gets rid of the ball quickly and hits his receivers on time and on target. He threw six more TD passes than Schaub last year.

Chicago Bears' defensive tackle Antonio Garay, 28, the son of a Jewish mother, appears to have an uncertain future, football-wise. According to the Chicago Sun Times, Garay, who weighs 300 pounds and stands 6-4, has been told by team management that he's no longer in their plans. Antonio is presently rehabbing his right leg after breaking it on an illegal block by a Redskins' player. Chicago will continue to pay him.

Punter Josh Miller, 38, was cut by the Tennessee Titans in late August and is not present on any other team's roster. Miller began his career in the Canadian Football League with the Baltimore Stallions and then went on to the NFL, playing mainly for the Steelers, and later the Patriots and Titans. With 12 years experience, Miller may yet gain employment when injuries begin to mount.

Tight end Mike Seidman, 27, appears to be out of football for the time being. He spent last season with the Indianapolis Colts, but his career has been wracked by multiple knee injuries. The last setback was a torn ACL a year ago.

Mike Rosenthal, 31, a onetime offensive tackle with the Giants, Vikings and last year with the Dolphins, is reportedly a sports radio talk show host with ESPN radio in Austin, Texas.

The 40-year rule

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

The famous phrase "hindsight is 20/20" is usually offered in derision – as in, "Sure, you can see things perfectly now, but what's the difficulty in that?"

Lately, though, I've been thinking that perfect vision, even if it takes years or decades to develop, is worth waiting for. Indeed, it's funny how much history informs the present, and how investigating the past can help us better understand current times.

Case in point: I just finished reading Michael Oren's excellent book about the Six Day War, titled Six Days of War: June 1967 and the Making of the Modern Middle East. It's a detailed history, with comprehensive day-by-day mini-histories of the war, but in many ways, it's also a psychological thriller in which the author attempts to get inside the heads of the major players.

There were, of course, heroes and villains in the story of the Six Day War, although I suppose who falls into which category depends on whom you're talking to. In Oren's account, the Arab leaders are mostly disorganized and inept (though Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser is portrayed in a somewhat more positive light), and the Israelis mostly brave and heroic.

Oren sees Israeli prime minister Levi Eshkol, foreign minister Abba Eban, virtually all the major military leaders, and even politicians from the religious right who vehemently opposed war (and, once the war started, opposed extending it) as displaying great strength and courage of conviction.

Those Israeli leaders whom Oren is less inclined to laud – such as defence minister Moshe Dayan, who is portrayed as apt to change his mind about whom to attack and when, and chief of staff Yitzhak Rabin, who suffered a nervous breakdown in the days before the war – are presented as eccentric anti-heroes rather than outright bad guys.

Forty-plus years after the Six Say War, we can see clearly what happened – who won and who lost – but we can also judge the leaders involved. And so, I wonder: 40 years from now, how will history judge Prime Minister Ehud Olmert?

Olmert is done as a politician – that much we know. It would be hard to find a leader of a democratic country who has left office under worse circumstances than this prime minister (the current U.S. president may tie him by the time his term ends). He was a failure in every sense of the word: as a wartime leader, as a gatherer of popular domestic support, and as a protector of his political party – not to mention his alleged criminal dealings (although these are hardly a surprise, given the pathetically shady world of Israeli politics).

Is there anything good to say about Olmert? The best one can say about his tenure as prime minister is that he didn't do too badly. Yes, the Second Lebanon War was something of a disaster, although, as I've written before, Olmert didn't lose the war as much as he didn't win it. Also, Olmert did little to stop rockets from continuing to fall on Sderot, although he is hardly alone in having failed at that endeavour.

Could Olmert have been a better prime minister? Yes. Could he have been worse? Maybe, but it's hard to imagine how. Case closed. Ehud Olmert: failed statesman.

But let's briefly consider one more question: 40 years from now, will we judge Olmert's career differently? On that we'll have to wait and see, for time, as we know, has a way of improving our vision, at least when we gaze back over our shoulders.

What we can say with certainty is that Olmert's legacy is out of his own hands. It will be up to the historians – who will break down and investigate his every word and action – to decide his place in history.

It will hinge on the leaders who follow him. If they do a worse job running Israel than he did, might we change our minds about Olmert somewhere down the line? Stay tuned.

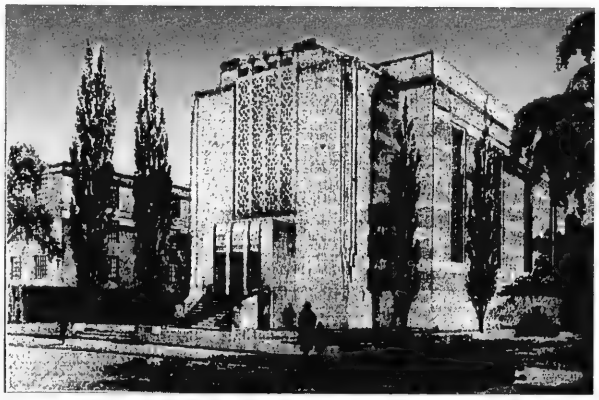
REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS



SYNAGOGUE NEVER BUILT: This architectural drawing of a splendid-looking synagogue, with an eastern motif and art deco stylings, appeared in a Toronto newspaper in 1930. Commissioned by an unnamed congregation, the shul was meant to accommodate 750 people. It was to have a frontage of 100 feet and a midtown site in the Avenue Road and Dupont Street area. The architects were Chapman and Oxley. The well-known firm designed many city landmark buildings, including the Holy Blossom Temple, which was erected on Bathurst Street in 1938.

Honey – more than a great sweetener

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I have heard that honey has many health benefits. Could you please explain some of them.

A. Honey is a food that we are all thinking about, craving or eating at this time of year, so it's a great time to learn all of its interesting benefits. Aside from being a delicious, all-natural sweetener that comes in endless varieties – in colour, quality and flavour, as well as nutritional benefits – it has a distinct flavour that trumps most other sweeteners.

Honey is known to contain a vast array of vitamins, minerals, antioxidants and amino acids, which may vary, depending on the type of flower that was pollinated to create any particular variety.

Interestingly, honey is known to be one of the only foods with a potentially unlimited shelf life; however, exposure to heat and other elements often does affect its colour, texture and flavour, and so about two years is really a typical shelf life. It is also interesting that despite its very high sugar content – usually a haven for bacterial growth – honey appears to inhibit the growth of bacteria as a result of its seemingly unique antibacterial properties.

Honey has long been used as a remedy for unlimited health and beauty ailments including easing sore throats. This is why you often see honey in teas and as an ingredient in cough remedies and throat lozenges.

Although honey tastes delicious and is nutritionally very interesting, it does still add up in the calorie department, and therefore, we do have to use it sparingly. One tablespoon contains approximately 60 calories, 0 g of fat and 17 g of carbohydrate. How does that compare to other common sweeteners? One tablespoon of sugar contains about 48 calories and 12 g of carbohydrate; agave nectar, another all natural sweetener – made from the agave plant – contains a comparable 60 calories per tablespoon and 15 g of carbohydrate.

One important thing to remember about honey as we dip our apples in it and adorn our yom tov tables – it is recommended that honey not be fed to babies under the age of one year, because, for infants, there is a small risk of botulism from honey.

Chag Samayach, and indulge in a little honey – drizzled over fresh challah, with a crisp autumn apple, on top of plain yogurt, in your tea, in a rich honey cake and, of course, on your Rosh Hashanah table. Shanah Tovah.

The Canadian Jewish news

'Hopefulness and purpose are our traditional way'

Editorial

The jolt of blue in the upper right-hand section of the painting on the cover of this supplement is, I surmise, the artist's personal statement of optimism for the future of the Jewish people.

The blue of the sky has been our millennial reminder that hopefulness and purpose are our traditional way to greet tomorrow.

Avi Katz, the immensely talented and insightful Israeli artist who drew the cover, emphasizes this. He knows the azure of the sky is more than an esthetic of his art. It is rather, a symbol of the philosophy, culture and outlook of an entire people.

The CJN asked Katz to provide a cover that encompassed the contents of this supplement. His painting is, thus, a perfect point of entry.

There are five very broad subjects of essays in the supplement: Looking Toward Tomorrow, Thinking of Jerusalem, Durban II, Good News from Israel and From the Desks of Readers.

We asked The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute based in Jerusalem (JPPPI) to provide a series of essays that explore some of the key issues that confront the Jewish people as we look toward the hazy future. (The essays reflect only the authors personal opinions based on their work at the JPPPI.)

The renowned JPPPI was established by the Jewish Agency for Israel six years ago. Its vision is to address strategic dilemmas facing the Jewish people and to engage in deep thinking and action-oriented policy planning to try to ensure that the Jewish People thrives.

The institute has engaged some of the finest strategic minds and professionals from public life, Jewish communal life, academia, the media, business and philanthropy to try to step meaningfully into the space between academia and decision-making in the Jewish world.

Yehezkel Dror, one of the essayists in the supplement, who retired this summer, is the institute's founding president. The former special Middle East envoy of the U.S. government, Dennis Ross, is the chairman of the board of directors. The members of the board comprise a very wide array of skilled, experienced thinkers and doers from around the Jewish world.

The flagship project of the JPPPI is its annual assessment of the state of the Jewish People. The 2009 assessment will feature an in-depth analysis of women in Judaism.

The focal point of Katz's painting is the shofar of Jerusalem stone that emerges from the archeological exploration in and around the Old City. With great skill and meaning, he thus deftly joins a key component of the theology and liturgy of Rosh Hashanah with the historical Jewish essence of the city.

He did so because the supplement also features an essay by the former chief archeologist of Jerusalem, Dan Bahat, about the archeological explorations in Israel's capital after the Six Day War.

The essay is important.

It provides a a scholarly, factual, scientific context from which to answer the absurd charges by Israel's enemies that a Jewish temple never stood in Jerusalem, that Jews have no historical claim to the Temple Mount.

The supplement also contains an essay concerning some of those very enemies who are preparing to spread their poison about the Jewish state at the Durban II conference next April.

To balance the sheet, so to speak, we have published a handful of "good news" stories provided by Israel 21c, a news service that features optimistic stories from Israel.

Finally, we have published two essays by younger, university-aged readers who provide their own unique perspectives from visits to Israel, and an essay by a reader who writes very poignantly about a group of Poles tenderly caring for a cemetery in Zdunska Wola.

Opposite this page are the Rosh Hashanah greetings of Sir Jonathan Sacks, the chief rabbi of the United Kingdom.

We have included his special invocation at the very outset of the supplement to give our readers the opportunity to be quickly inspired by his words: "Jews never lost the capacity to rejoice."

As Rosh Hashanah approaches, as we look toward tomorrow, we keep the chief rabbi's words close to heart.

We hope you find some reading merit and enjoyment in this supplement.

Shanah Tovah.

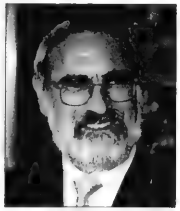
'The joy of the Lord is your strength'



By RABBI JONATHAN SACKS

As I write these words, the world – not just the Jewish world – is facing a period of turbulence and uncertainty. The international political situation is hard to read; the economic situation harder still. We face recession; no one knows whether this will deepen into depression. "These are the times," said Paine, "that try men's [and women's] souls."

Wrestling with this challenge, I found my mind going back to a Rosh Hashanah long ago, in the mid-fifth century BCE. The Babylonian exile was over. Many Jews had returned. The Second Temple had been rebuilt. Yet there was no miraculous transformation in the situation of Jews. They continued to face enemies without and divisions within. Outmarriage was high. A significant part of the population was deeply assimilated. Half could not even speak Hebrew (Neh. 13: 24).

That Israel survived at all at this time was due to two remarkable leaders, the statesman-diplomat Nehemiah and the scholar-teacher Ezra. They realized that something radical had to be done to give the nation the strength to endure: not military or political but spiritual. The people needed a clear identity, a framework of values, a set of beliefs, a way of life. The national imperative was, in short, a return to Torah and a renewal of the covenant between the Jewish people and God.

On Rosh Hashanah they gathered the people before the Water Gate in Jerusalem. Ezra read the Torah to them. Educators were placed throughout the crowd to explain what was being said. The people, realizing how far they had drifted from their mission, began to weep. It was then that Nehemiah said words that, for me, contain one of the secrets of Jewish survival. He said: "This day is sacred to the Lord your God. Do not mourn or weep . . . Go and enjoy choice food and sweet drinks, and send some to those who have nothing prepared. This day is sacred to our Lord. Do not grieve, for the joy of the Lord is your strength." (Neh. 8: 9-10)

Let those words echo in the mind: "The joy of the Lord is your strength."

Jews never lost the capacity to rejoice. At times of poverty and oppression, they celebrated Shabbat and the festivals as if they were royalty. They studied like aristocrats of the mind. They celebrated weddings as if they had no care in the world. I sensed that same resilience in Israel throughout the difficult years of suicide bombings, Katyushas and Kassams. The strength of the Jewish people is that we never allowed our enemies to rob us of our ability to laugh, and celebrate, and say l'chaim, and sing. Nehemiah, the shrewd statesman, was right. "The joy of the Lord is your strength."

It is not easy to rejoice in hard times. It calls for real disciplines of body and mind. It needs habits of gratitude, rituals of giving thanks, sacred times when we stop thinking of what we lack and instead focus on what we have. It means celebrating family and home and children, love and friends and community. That is what Judaism trains us to do. Half its rituals are about celebrating and sanctifying life. Rosh Hashanah is a sustained prayer for life.

There have been civilizations that worshipped power, wealth, art, science, victory in war, dominance over others, privilege, hierarchy, superiority. Judaism found joy in life itself: life in love, life in community, life in the birth of a child, the life that flows through the generations as we honour the past and cherish the future. Jews knew that you could lose all else and still celebrate life.

In life we find God. His is the breath we breathe, the call we hear, the forgiveness we feel, the strength we need. No other religion has so focused on and sanctified the blessing of being. This sustained our people in the past. May it sustain us in the coming year. May God bless us all with life and health, and peace.

Bebirkat ketivah vechatimah tovah lekha ulekhol Yisrael.

Sir Jonathan Sacks is the Chief Rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of the Commonwealth.

Next winter in Eilat and some other thoughts

When I was a small child in Bucharest my father made it plain that our identity was that of Romanian Jews. He made it clear to me that while we were first Romanians we should never neglect or forget to mention our Jewishness. When we made aliyah in 1959, as we stepped out of the bus and entered our modest first apartment on the outskirts of Jerusalem, he said to me, "Now everything has changed – here we are Jewish first and then Israelis. This is the only place on earth where you can afford to be Jewish first."

His Zionist dream was realized almost fifty years ago in a completely different world. This new world, the one we live in now, poses many threats and challenges to Jewish civilization, but it has also opened windows of opportunity to conceive and cultivate multi-dimensional and bi-national identities that were quite closed before.

Confronting these issues in a sophisticated manner is not only a matter of thinking strategically and engaging in policy planning. As the descendants of an ancient civilization each of us has a vested interest in its continued survival. We must unite forces globally to translate operational recommendations into action-directed plans. Looking squarely at the threat posed by fundamentalist terrorist actors, dealing with existential threats like Iran or unpleasant political surprises requires that we enhance the relationship among our various communities and expand local initiatives to cope with these threats. Every Jewish community on earth should be plugged into a broad and co-operative matrix for global crisis management.

By AVINOAM BAR-YOSEF

Not only would such a global network aid in coping with external threats and natural disasters, it would also help us to confront creeping challenges like demographic shifts in Europe and to effectively come to the aid, and sometimes rescue, of threatened Jewish communities. Although they may be small in numbers, they nevertheless compel us to invoke: Kol Israel Arevim Ze La Ze. All Israel is responsible for one another, and all of us together are responsible for the continuity of the Jewish civilization.

We also face critical internal dangers like assimilation and sectarian in-fighting, as well as the challenge of crafting and implementing a new paradigm for relations between the Jews of Israel and the Jews of the Diaspora.

As we move into the New Year, we must also look beyond the half-empty glass and acknowledge the unprecedented opportunities before us. We should not neglect our assets. Even assimilation can be viewed as an opportunity to embrace out-married couples and their children. We should also not neglect the extended circle of those with some roots extending back into Judaism, whose personalities were partly shaped by a Jewish grandparent.

The Jewish people is at a peak of its history and enjoys, for the first time, significant hard power: a reborn state with remarkable defensive forces, a thriving economy and a democratic system strong enough to learn the lessons of the Second Lebanon War, repair what needs repairing, and reject the misconduct of some Israeli leaders.

The soft power held today by the Jewish people is also unprecedented. It has accrued not only through its innovations of culture, science and technology, but also because it includes wisdom, wealth and political influence in the West, especially in North America.

Other aspects of our new world which must be tended assiduously include the rise of emerging superpowers like China and India which are not of biblical tradition, and thus, have no real history of anti-Semitic prejudice.

Another paramount issue of these modern times is that of tinkering with creation—making a real contribution in rewriting the basic rules of life. New developments and capabilities in medicine and technology require a careful examination that should draw from the long and venerable discourse of Jewish ethics and jurisprudence for guidance. The Jewish people has a duty to make a positive contribution to humanity; this is not just a benefit oriented issue, but also an imperative of our tradition of tikkun olam.

Israelis should invite Diaspora fellows to build second homes in Israel

Fifty years ago it was a completely different world; the barriers between East and West were enormous. Nationalism was reinforced not only by an iron curtain and borders redrawn and mapped by men, but also by huge geographic distances between places, obstacles of mountain and sea. Modes of modern communication were still in an embryonic stage. In that world, dual loyalty was a concern and suspicion on the minds of many—something children were instructed to guard against. Today, the technology and accessibility of travel as well as the ubiquity of cyberspace have reduced the significance of uni-national identity, and with it, worries about competing and conflicting loyalties.

Clearly, Jews like any other citizens owe their first duty and loyalty to their home countries, exactly as my father thought. But for most citizens of the world, the issue is no longer as relevant as it once was. Dual-citizenship, spending time in both one's home country and country of heritage is increasingly common; we see it in the Irish, French, Italians and many other ethnic groups.

So many northerners — like your Canadian tsiporei sheleg (snowbirds) —escape the brutality of winter and spend time in warmer, sunnier environs. This is an opportunity not to be lost on the State of Israel and new, part-time forms of aliyah must be conceptualized and supported. Israeli Jews should invite and provide incentives for their Diaspora fellows to build second homes in Southern Israel instead of Palm Beach, Tucson or Las Vegas. Certainly, living part of the year in Israel is of particular value to the next generation, providing young people opportunities for learning and socializing that are distinctly Jewish.

You will find that each of the op-eds prepared by JPPPI staff members for this special Rosh Hashanah supplement of The Canadian Jewish News focuses in-depth on the issues I have touched on here.

Digital interconnectivity is not just a matter of convenience that allows one to conduct business from anywhere and summon information at a tap of the fingers, it is also a tool we can use to enhance, rebuild and modernize Jewish unity. And so, from my office in Jerusalem I wish you a Shanah Tovah and leave you with this: L'shanah habah - next winter in Eilat!

A grand strategy for the Jewish people

By YEHEZKEL DROR

Tragically but not surprisingly for the few who understand the realities of the 21st century, the August 2008 Caucasus war and its antecedents demonstrated that the foreseeable future will not be one of transforming swords into agricultural tools.

Quite the contrary.

Radical and very competitive shifts in global power structures, increasing scarcities, demographic pressures, civilizational conflicts and other destabilizing developments are to be expected.

At the same time, mass killing instruments that enable a few to kill very many and the strong to easily overcome the brave and the just are increasingly easily available. Even more potent mass-killing materials are sure to be developed and will be readily available in the 21st century. Taken together with growing disparities in standards of living and a variety of economic shocks that are likely to occur, humanity is in for a roller coaster ride that is sure to be painful and bloody, with the end-station just as likely to be bad as good.

Within these turbulent geo-strategic realities the Jewish People must survive and thrive. However, to have a good chance of doing so it needs a carefully crafted grand strategy that fits the nature of the Jewish People as a civilizational polity equally distributed between the State of Israel and networks of voluntary communities concentrated in the West and especially in the United States.

Such a grand strategy has to be sufficiently elastic to fit a variety of dynamic situations. It must also fit into the interests of the countries in which the majority of Jews reside so as to avoid any accusations of "conflict of loyalties" and to be able to mobilize the support systems necessary for success.

'We require new institutions appropriate for 21st century'

But, still, it must focus on the survival and pluralistic thriving of the Jewish People as a whole, assuring the security of Israel as a Jewish state and of the Jewish communities worldwide.

Crafting such a grand strategy requires institutions to facilitate cooperation between Jewish communities and policy planning organs in order to develop the strategic principles to be agreed upon subject, of course, to local preferences and needs.

Both of these requirements are presently being met only in part. We require new Jewish People institutions that are appropriate for the 21st century. But such institution-building requires some initial notions of what should be included in a Jewish People grand strategy.

The following is a list of ten possible principles that might be included in a Jewish People grand strategy for the 21st century:

1. Increase the "hard power" of the Jewish People, mainly by helping Israel strengthen its military capacities.

2. Increase the political influence of the Jewish People with action that is appropriate for local conditions. The American Jewish community's experience can be a model. In European Union countries this requires integrated action of Jewish communities distributed among the member states far above present levels.

3. Increase the "soft power" of the Jewish People by building up its image as a powerful and high-quality civilizational polity.

4. Influence Jewish economic activities so as to try to ensure the long term thriving of the Jewish people as well as to benefit local economic considerations.

5. Make careful distinctions between what is conducive to long-term survival and thriving in realpolitical terms and what is "politically correct". Give priority to the first. Thus, good relations with China and Turkey are much more critical than concern about Tibet and Armenian history.

6. Craft grand strategies to build up relations with emerging super-power China and increasingly powerful global actors such as India, Russia, and the European Union.

7. Develop a multi-layer grand strategy towards Islamic actors: cooperation and dialogue with peaceful actors; stern action against the aggressive ones.

8. Adopt a forward stance towards global governance institutions such as the United Nations and the International Court of Justice. Press for justice: blame countries for human rights violations, demand punitive action against countries defying UN Security Council Resolution 1701 (prohibiting rearmament of Hezbollah). Play an increasing role in global governance redesign.

9. Build up and strengthen Jewish People crisis management capacities to cope with issues such as multi-target acts of terror.

10. Improve the Diaspora understanding of the Israel-Palestinian, Israel-Arab and Israel-Iran conflict. A great deal of current Diaspora (and Israeli) thinking and action on the subject on the "left" as well as the on the "right" ignore clear realities and their likely developments, being more "now-time" slogans than well-considered long-term proposals.

These and other grand strategy principles should be framed as also serving the long-term needs of humanity as a whole. There are at least three reasons for doing so:

• the moral imperative of tikkun olam – mending the world;

• the long-term convergence of the thriving of the Jewish People and that of humanity as a whole;

• the realpolitical need to improve the global standing of the Jewish People and to avoid the misunderstanding of its grand policies as an updated sort of Protocol of the Learned Elders of Zion.

To evaluate and advance the ideas put forth here, it would be good, as a first step, to have a five-day retreat of the best 10 to 15 Jewish strategic thinkers, based on papers prepared by the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute and invited consultants.

Doing so may provide a solid basis for crafting detailed grand strategy principles, operational details and designs for the required institutional changes. This should, then, be presented transparently to main Jewish People thinkers, planners and decision makers.

Yehezkel Dror is the founding president of the Jewish People Planning Policy Institute.

Why is transnationalism supported in Canada but still feared in Israel?

By ISRAEL PUPKO

The globalization process, improvements in the means of transportation and communication, and the dissemination of multicultural absorption policies have contributed to the fact that more and more immigrants live in or maintain links to more than one country. These migrants are defined as transnational migrants.

Canada and Israel are both migration countries. As such, they have substantial migrant populations and are heavily influenced by the influx of migrants and their incorporation (or lack thereof) into the mainstream society. Both countries receive increasing numbers of immigrants who conduct transnational lives.

Just recently I had the opportunity to travel to Canada to engage in research on Jewish transnational migrants. My research field trip left me with the impression that transnational migration is more easily practiced in Canada than in Israel. The reason is that policy makers and community leaders in Canada may be more ready to encourage transnational migration than their Israeli counterparts.

Canada is a dynamic "migration laboratory" in which a researcher can hardly avoid encountering little migration anecdotes. Take the following as an example:

One day, as I was playing with my daughter in a playground, Kimgy, an 11- year-old Korean girl, approached and started speaking with us. Her first question was where were we from.

Her question struck me. In Israel I often take our daughter to the playground, and other children have interacted with us on many occasions, but never before had I been approached with such a question. Obviously Kimgy's interest was due to hearing us speaking in a foreign language. In Israel I often speak with my daughter in Spanish and yet nobody asks us where we are from.

As we continued talking we came to know that Kimgy and her little brother migrated a few years ago from South Korea to Mexico where they lived for a few years. Kimgy and her brother learned Spanish during their time in Mexico, but their parents did not. So they speak in Spanish between themselves and they speak Korean with their parents. Kimgy's father continues to travel to Mexico for work. Kimgy was very excited to be able to speak Spanish with us.

During the various interviews I conducted in Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa with policy-makers, planners, public opinion shapers, academics, and leaders of the Jewish and Chinese/Hong Kong communities, I learned that none of the interviewees fears or is opposed to transnational migration.

Most of the interviewees consider transnational migration an opportunity for the country. One of the academics with whom I met told me that "encouraging transnational migration should be one of the grand strategies of Canada. Just look how many Chinese and Indian immigrants now hold Canadian citizenship; and since these are growing superpowers, Canadian interests will be automatically protected in the future." The largest contribution to Canada from the transnational involvement of immigrants with their countries of origin is considered to be economic.

In Israel, in comparison, S.N. Eisenstadt – the grandmaster of Israeli sociology – believes that most of the policy makers are still hostage to the migration policies developed in the 1950s, a decade when the absorption of immigrants to Israel was conceived in terms of the 'melting pot' model. Many in Israel are suspicious of the allegiances of transnational Jewish immigrants, some others claim that the stability of the family unit is at stake when one of the parents travels abroad to work leaving their spouses and children in Israel.

None of these fears was raised during my interviews in Canada. Indeed some more conservative Canadian policy makers claimed Canada should reconsider how much the country really gains from transnational migration. Some are fearful that the lack of economic integration and participation of transnational migrants in the Canadian work force might represent a counter benefit for the country in the long run. Since transnational migrants do not participate economically in the country (they do not pay income taxes), the country would find it more difficult to be able to pay pensions in the longer run.

Other, more liberal, interviewees claimed that although some transnational migrants might not be paying taxes on their incomes earned abroad, they bring foreign money into the country in the form of consumption. Further, these immigrants do pay other types of taxes.

But even among the more cautious policy makers, transnational migration is still considered an almost inevitable solution for first generation immigrants. Because human capital is not always easy to transfer to other countries, some immigrants experience a drastic drop in their careers since the host society is unable to integrate them into adequate or appropriate employment despite their qualifications and credentials.

So how is transnationalism constructed and lived in Canada?

Transnationalism in Canada is about driving a car around Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue displaying a foreign national flag, after a soccer match has been played thousands of miles away from Toronto, to celebrate the achievements of the national team back 'home'; it is about having official signs in subway stations in several languages, not spoken by the majority of citizens, but spoken by a majority of residents in the particular area where the subway station is located. Transnationalism is about developing economic entrepreneurship that crosses geographical boundaries; it is about facilitating the enduring transnational transference of human, financial and social capital and knowledge.

It is about making an effort by the recipient society, to integrate the immigrants into the mainstream community on the immigrants' own terms and values and not in a patronizing way, through the host's prism. Consider for example the way the organized Jewish community in Toronto relates to Israeli immigrants in that city:

Serious attempt to bring Israelis closer to the mainstream

A relatively new initiative called 'Kachol Lavan' (Blue and White) is a supplementary Jewish school which has been developed to cater to the needs of the children of Israelis in Toronto.

As I learned from interviews with professionals from the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, 'Kachol Lavan' started as a grassroots initiative by Israeli immigrants themselves and receives financial and professional help from UJA Federation. Building a curriculum for the school was an interesting dialogue and challenging process between UJA Federation professionals and immigrant leaders, through which the former came to understand that if the school is to succeed, it has to give expression to core Israeli values (Israeli secular education), and not necessarily to the core values of the local Jewish population.

Israeli Jews in Toronto join in the community march on behalf of the Jewish state.

UJA Federation has come a long way in their relations with Israeli immigrants. If in the past Israelis were officially or unofficially excluded from the mainstream Jewish community and their needs were left unattended, now the community is sincerely engaged in a serious attempt to bring Israelis closer to the mainstream community.

This momentous paradigm change was due in part to the efforts of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Toronto (JIAS) to convince the Israeli Consulate that the exclusion of the Israelis from the Jewish community would only result in their alienation from the State of Israel. JIAS claimed that the rejection of Israeli immigrants by Jewish organizations would negatively affect the readiness of Israelis to be part and parcel of the Jewish people. By bringing the Israelis closer to the Jewish local community, they wanted to bring them closer to Israel as well.

The integration of Israeli immigrants into the Toronto Jewish community is still far from 'resting on a bed of roses'. The number of children participating in the activities of the organized community, including Jewish schooling, and Jewish summer camps is still small, if not marginal. The numbers of Israeli Jews who hold leadership positions within the different boards of directors of UJA Federation is very modest, to say the least. But this paradigm change indeed represents a very interesting, refreshing and encouraging alternative to the historical position of the State of Israel and Jewish communities toward the Israelis as if they didn't exist. Now, the local Jewish leadership has shown the courage to stop relating to the Israelis as 'yordim.'

There are at least four social transnational social fields developing between Israel and Canada, or four shared challenges for Israel, Canada, and the organized Jewish community in Toronto regarding migration:

1. Native-born Israelis living in Canada;
2. Russian Jews living in Canada (some of them having arrived directly from the former Soviet Union and some after a stay in Israel);
3. French Jews migrating to Montreal;
4. Jewish community professionals.

Transnational migration is not a win-lose situation, but rather a win-win-win situation. In this game everybody gets to win: the sending and receiving societies, the local Jewish community and the immigrants themselves.

But in order to gain the benefits of transnational migration, vis-à-vis these four populations, adequate policy measures should be constructed in concert by the Israeli and Canadian governments with serious inputs from the local Jewish community and the immigrant communities as well.

In the meanwhile the State of Israel could learn from the Canadian paradigm on immigrant integration to take advantage of transnational migration synergy.

Looking Toward Tomorrow

Tikkun Olam: thinking hard and acting well

By YEHUDAH MIRSKY

Recent years have seen a surge of projects in social justice, humanitarianism, ecology and similar endeavours, aiming both to bolster Jewish identity and enhance Jews' standing with other communities, couched in terms of "tikkun olam." This traditional term, literally meaning "repair and restoration of the world," has for most of Jewish history referred to specific halachot enacted for the sake of equity and more broadly the spiritual redemption of the world. In recent years it has come to signify a Jewish commitment to ethically charged social activism, a consciously-assumed Jewish responsibility to work for the general welfare of humanity. Today, inspired by this ideal, increasing numbers of people are doing extraordinary things.

At the same time, so prevalent has the term become that it runs the risk of becoming a fashionable and ultimately meaningless buzzword. And that would be a shame.

Tikkun olam ought to be understood as a Jewish social responsibility arising out of a Jewish commitment to human flourishing and well-being, guided by over-arching moral imperatives, as articulated and interpreted through Jewish history and tradition. It is, in this light, not a substitute for other, more particular or more strictly spiritual or metaphysical Jewish values – but takes its place alongside them and entails articulating distinctively Jewish values and objectives. It offers the possibility of meeting our moral obligations as Jews and as members of humanity, of reinvigorating Jewish identity and better integrating the Jewish people into global civil society. At the same time, it can also serve as a means of ignoring difficult questions and generating new problems. Some clear thinking is called for.

There are three good reasons to make tikkun olam a feature of contemporary Jewish life.

First, as members of the human race we bear inescapable moral obligations, and participate in the broader ethical life of humankind. In this globalizing age of breathtaking social and technological change and equally breathtaking global interconnectedness, the urgency of a moral commitment to humanity at large is perhaps keener than ever before. And no matter one's specific political, religious or ideological position, there is no doubt that both interpersonal ethics and a commitment to fostering a just and moral social and political order on earth have been central to Jewish thought and practice throughout history, however imperfectly those ideals have been realized in practice.

Second, tikkun olam can be a moving and stirring vehicle of identity. As Rav Kook pointed out nearly a century ago, in the course of modernity, key dimensions of Jewishness – ethical universalism, group identity and a relationship with spirituality and the sacred – broke apart from one another, each becoming, as it were, the property of a specific party. Thus actions by committed Jews, as Jews, undertaking social activism with a universal orientation can have a powerfully healing effect on the fractured Jewish identities of our times.

Moreover, many young people and others often perceive the Jewish people as narrowly self-centered and chauvinistic, a perception both deeply disturbing and destructive. Tikkun olam work which makes credible and meaningful contributions to the well-being of humanity, done so out of humility, sincere conviction and in concert with other groups and peoples, offers an especially powerful alternative to these disturbing perceptions. Needless to say, it can only offer that alternative if pursued for its own sake and with integrity, with real commitment over time and not as an exercise in image-building and public relations.

Third, tikkun olam can foster new relationships in global civil society. A salient feature of today's world is, alongside the increasing interconnectedness of governments, economies and markets, the steady growth and sophistication of global networks of Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs), which interact in increasingly complex ways with one another and with international bodies, public and private. Tikkun olam work offers the possibility of enhancing the Jewish people's position within global civil society and of fostering positive images of the Jewish people. Yet these benefits too will be meaningless – and indeed counterproductive – if they are pursued as ends in themselves and not anchored in a good faith moral commitment, pursued on its own terms and to substantive ends of social and global responsibility. Indeed, parading one's social awareness is not only self-defeating but even self-parodying.

At the same time, four serious and critical questions can be raised about the entire enterprise of tikkun olam.

First, does it encourage the sort of humanitarian and charitable "feel good" work which does little other than to assuage the consciences of those involved in it at best and often ignores the complex dimensions of problems or our own involvement in systems which generate injustice?

Second, is talk of tikkun olam as a meaningful, long-term vehicle for Jewish identity just a particularly edifying way of changing the subject? In the absence of some other distinctively Jewish commitments – communal, spiritual, textual – simply encouraging young people who are otherwise indifferent to or estranged from Jewish life to engage in humanitarian work with no distinctive, let alone transformative, Jewish dimensions other than the label "tikkun olam" will strengthen neither Jewish identities nor Jewish life. Humanitarianism, social justice and ecological advocacy are not distinctively "Jewish" as such, and while this makes them meaningful points of contact with people of goodwill outside the Jewish community it also suggests that in and of themselves they will not reinforce stable Jewish identities over time, no matter how they are labeled.

Third, what is the relationship between tikkun olam and political work and advocacy? Engaging in meaningful tikkun olam work regularly entails staking out distinctive – and regularly contentious – positions on a range of issues of political, economic and social policy. Yet as we know, there is seldom, if ever, one unequivocally "Jewish" position on most issues of social policy, however much partisans of left, right, centre and everything between wish there were. Nor, when it comes to matters of social policy, does the tradition usually speak in one unitary voice. Moreover, Israel figures in this entire discussion in several ways. It is a Jewish state where by definition Jews assume responsibility for all of society and its welfare. It is also home to such thorny questions as mounting income inequalities, discrimination against Arab citizens, treatment of foreign workers and the unresolved status of the Palestinians and of Judea and Samaria; these and other problems threaten to undercut the moral suasion of Israeli and Jewish social justice efforts as a whole. Moreover, tikkun olam may beckon, for better or worse, as an avenue for the expression of Jewish ethics in the international geopolitical arena apart from the wrenching and at times seemingly intractable moral dilemmas in which the State of Israel finds itself. We must keep all these dimensions in mind.

Fourth, if indeed many activities being pursued under the rubric of tikkun olam do not proceed in any distinctively Jewish fashion, what value if any do they add to ethically-charged action undertaken by people of goodwill in other frameworks, and what claim can they make on Jewish communal energies and resources?

Ethical teachings are a precious gift

These critical questions are not meant to stymie the enterprise of tikkun olam, but to get us all thinking hard about how to make it work. Tikkun olam is a project which has the potential to unleash special energies and passions – and that potential needs to be realized.

I would briefly offer several basic recommendations as a spur to thought and action. First, Jewish life proceeds through a basic conceptual vocabulary – including such terms as Torah, Jewish people, mitzvah – and tikkun olam ought to be incorporated into that basic lexicon, with the full awareness that there is no obviously or unequivocally "Left" or "Right" way to live up to that ideal. Judaism's vast library of texts and equally vast range of historical experience, heroic and tragic, mined with knowledge and care, comprise a large and precious resource for contemporary moral reflection and action. A careful attention to details and a pragmatic approach to problem-solving is itself a hallmark of the Jewish tradition in general and the Jewish legal, halachic, tradition in particular and this focused pragmatism may itself be a signal Jewish element of tikkun olam. This moral commitment must be brought to bear on specific problems and in very concrete, indeed prosaic, terms.

Second, to that end, scholars and practitioners should undertake joint efforts to think hard in a disciplined fashion and in both theoretical and practical terms about how the Jewish people might realize the many potential dimensions of tikkun olam, and – more importantly – to develop educational materials that can be incorporated into education and programming. These materials should bring Jewish texts into dialogue with the present, including those texts which speak in cadences well removed from the universal ethics underlying the contemporary understanding of tikkun olam.

Third, thought should be given to developing several tikkun olam projects which could engage large numbers of Jews across geographic and other boundaries. One possibility is the creation of a Jewish Youth Corps which would bring together young people from across the Jewish world, including the Diaspora and Israel, and from across denominations for work in a range of countries or settings, with a strong learning component as well. Another might be a clearinghouse for tikkun olam projects and ideas.

Jewish ethical teachings are one of the tradition's most precious gifts, to the world, and to us. Today, tikkun olam beckons as one particularly powerful interpretation of that heritage, one which may indeed make the Jewish people better people and the world a better place. But that in turn depends on whether we are able to act wisely, and think hard.

Dr. Yehudah Mirsky, a former US State Department official and scholar of Jewish thought, is a fellow of the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute. This essay is adapted from a longer paper, available on request.

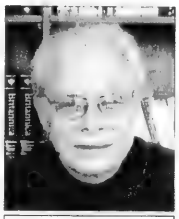
'Insider/Outsider' (With Apologies to Herman Wouk)



By CHAIM I. WAXMAN

We live in an era of paradoxes. On the one hand, cyberspace and globalization have contributed to an era of "post-ethnicity" and the democratization of identity. Indeed, we increasingly view ourselves as comprising numerous identities which we create and which are constantly changing. At the same time, we see many Jews inquiring into their roots. Numerous techniques and programs have been developed for "discovering Jewish roots," some of which fly smack in the face of the notion of self-made identity. In part, the paradox is a result of differing conceptions of the nature and meaning of identity. Both among social scientists and among Jewish religio-cultural authorities there are varieties of conceptions of Jewish identity as well as differing attitudes toward outsiders who wish to become insiders, who wish to join Judaism and the Jewish people.

One manifestation of the deep divide on some of these issues was the most impassioned debate this past year between the haredi and religious Zionist camps of Israeli Orthodoxy, namely, the issue of conversion. In an unprecedented move, Rabbi Avraham Sherman, a prominent haredi judge on the High Rabbinical Court, issued a ruling in which he lambasted a very prominent Religious Zionist rabbi, Haim Drukman, and retroactively raised questions as to the Jewishness of the thousands converted through the Conversion Authority headed by him. Many of the converts affected by the ruling are olim from the Former Soviet Union (FSU) who immigrated under the Law of Return but who are not considered Jewish according to Halachah. Subsequently, he averred that he considers converts a "plague" who introduce "foreign influences" to the Jewish people.

Without here going into the details of the debate, suffice it to say that it reflected contrasting attitudes toward the phenomenon of conversion and it is an issue whose significance and rift-causing potential will increase rapidly and dramatically with each passing year, if not month.

At the core of the issue is the rising global rate of Jewish out-marriage in which the non-Jewish spouse does not convert to Judaism. For example, in the United States, the rate of out-marriage is over 50 percent; in France and the United Kingdom, it is over 40 percent; in Canada, it is over 30 percent; and in the FSU, it is over 75 percent. In Israel, it is estimated that about 3,000 of those who immigrated from the FSU between 1989 and 2005 are not Jewish according to Halachah and are not registered as Jewish by the Ministry of Interior. In addition, there are increasing numbers of Israeli Jews who marry non-Jews abroad and then return with their spouses to Israel.

One product of the high rate of intermarriage is that Jewry must face increasingly important issues with respect to the children and grandchildren of intermarriages. Several decades ago, Reform Judaism adopted a heatedly-debated policy of "patrilineal descent," according to which a child of either a Jewish father or mother is deemed Jewish, provided they manifest "appropriate and timely public and formal acts of identification with the Jewish faith and people."

Even for Reform Jews, however, the issue has not been completely resolved because in the United States, only about 40 percent of such children are being raised as Jews. The vast majority do not manifest even minimal identification with Judaism and the Jewish people. Moreover, as Sylvia Barack Fishman and Daniel Parmer, of Brandeis University, have recently demonstrated, the policy of patrilineal descent has contributed to a dramatic gender imbalance in American Jewish life, but not the kind that is usually first thought. For example, they show that Reform temples and synagogues are run and primarily populated by women, and that men are disappearing from synagogue life.

For the Orthodox, Conservative, and "traditional" segments of Judaism, the alternatives appear to be simpler: conversion or not. However, they are in fact very complex. As I alluded to above and elaborated in these pages last year, there are starkly contrasting perspectives on conversion and conversion outreach.

With respect to children of intermarriages, the more open position was expressed by the late Rabbi Moshe Feinstein

Question of conversion more critical in Israel than in Diaspora

(1895-1986), arguably the leading rabbinic decisor in the North American Orthodox Jewish community, who argued that many children of intermarriages consider themselves to be Jewish, in any case, and will probably marry Jews. It is, therefore, much more preferable that they be encouraged to convert, rather than being proscribed from converting which only increases the rate of intermarriage.

A staunchly opposing position was recently propounded by Rabbi Moshe Sternbuch, the head of the Rabbinical Court of the Edah Haharedis and one of the leading decisors in the Israeli haredi community. Arguing, among other reasons, that such outreach only increases intermarriage, he asserted that "it is absolutely forbidden to try to proselytize a non-Jew even if he mistakenly views himself as Jewish." He staunchly rejected outreach efforts toward them, and he then rejected all outreach efforts to the intermarried among Russian Jews.

It is more than interesting to note that Rabbi Abraham ibn Ezra (1089/1092-1164/1167) suggested that the reason for including gerei toshav, non-Jewish residents, in the mitzvah of the septennial Hakhel assembly (Deut. 31:12) was because it might encourage them to convert. Much more recently, Rabbi Meir Simcha of Dvinsk (1843-1926), in his biblical commentary, Meshekh Chokhma (Deut. 23:7), suggested that it is a mitzvah to reach out to resident non-Jews and to support them, because they will thus see the beauty of God's ways, will become attached to them, and will strive to convert. Neither of these prominent rabbis shared the view expressed by Rabbi Sternbuch and much of the haredi community.

The question of conversion is today much more of a critical one in Israel than in the Diaspora because in Israel, the children of intermarriages will invariably assimilate sociologically into the Jewish majority even if they are not halachically Jewish.

They attend schools that are predominantly Jewish; they play with Jewish children; they serve in the Israel Defence Forces side-by-side with Jews; and the probabilities are very high that they will marry Jews. It can, therefore, be expected that a resolution will be found despite the haredi hard line. Many among the National Religious and Modern Orthodox are prepared to adopt a more open stance, especially after what they perceive as the reprehensible insult of Rabbi Drukman. Indeed, some non-haredi Orthodox rabbis in Israel have called for the Supreme Court to intervene and prevent implementation of Rabbi Sherman's decision, and there are even calls for setting up an alternative rabbinate to the current haredi-dominated official rabbinate.

The arrival of immigrants since the 1990s from the former Soviet Union, such as the group seen here, makes the issue of conversion in Israel very important according to the author. [Israel photo]

In the Diaspora, given the fact that the overwhelming majority of the children of intermarriages do not identify as Jews and will not marry Jews, there is much less pressing need for proactive conversion efforts.

Outreach can greatly enhance Israel

Among the Orthodox, the near exclusive authority of the haredi approach means it is probably futile to even suggest such efforts. However, that does not mean that Jewry should be oblivious to that population and, indeed, it would be self-defeating if it were because although the overwhelming majority do not identify as Jews, they have ties to the Jewish people which are, hopefully, positive.

It is no secret and also probably no coincidence that a number of world leaders who have Jewish backgrounds to one degree or another – perhaps a Jewish grandparent – have expressed a sense of closeness to and affinity for Israel and the Jewish people.

In the United States alone, there are hundreds of thousands of non-Jewish children of intermarriages and many more who are non-Jewish grandchildren of the intermarried. They are a potentially significant resource for the Jewish people, and it would be in the interest of the Jewish people to foster ties with them. As a first step, providing knowledge about Jews and Judaism is likely to enhance their ties. In a number of university Jewish Studies courses I gave over the years, I had non-Jewish children of intermarriages and others with Jewish family connections among my students, and they often expressed a deep appreciation for the opportunity to learn about the people and culture of their Jewish relative(s). There is no reason to wait until the college years and rely on university Jewish Studies courses. There are a variety of other venues under which formal courses as well as informal educational programs that educate about Jews and Jewish culture can be provided to the population at large. Many settings already exist but are much too underutilized as informal educational programs. For example, many Jewish community centres, Y's, Jewish family service programs, Jewish hospitals, etc., provide excellent social services but are bereft of Jewish cultural content. In their zeal to demonstrate their non-denominationalism and non-sectarianism, all too often major efforts are undertaken to hide any semblance of anything Jewish in the programs.

Another initiative within this context might be to borrow from and adapt a project undertaken by the Tampa, Florida, Jewish Community Center, namely, a Jewish discovery museum whose objective is to "to help encourage Jewish engagement among the unaffiliated population." In this case, however, it is not unaffiliated Jews who are the target population but, rather, non-Jews who have some Jewish connection. Again, the objective is not to have them become Jews but, rather, to learn more about the group and culture of their Jewish relative(s).

There are surely many other creative ways of positively connecting non-Jews to the people and culture of their Jewish forebears. Some will reject the entire endeavour as threatening because they fear that it will just increase intermarriage.

What must now be carefully considered is whether that fear is grounded in reality and whether it is sufficient to abandon an effort which has the potential to greatly enhance the stature of Israel and the Jewish people as we move in the 21st century.

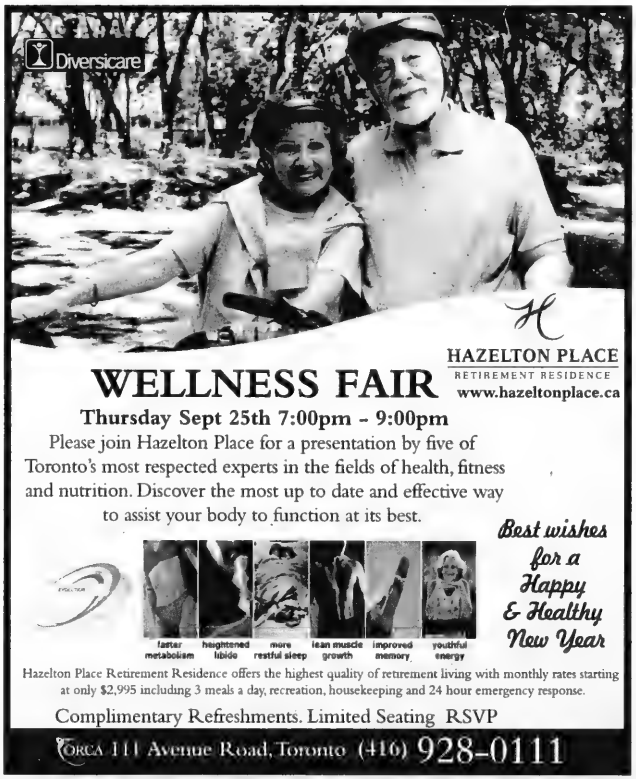
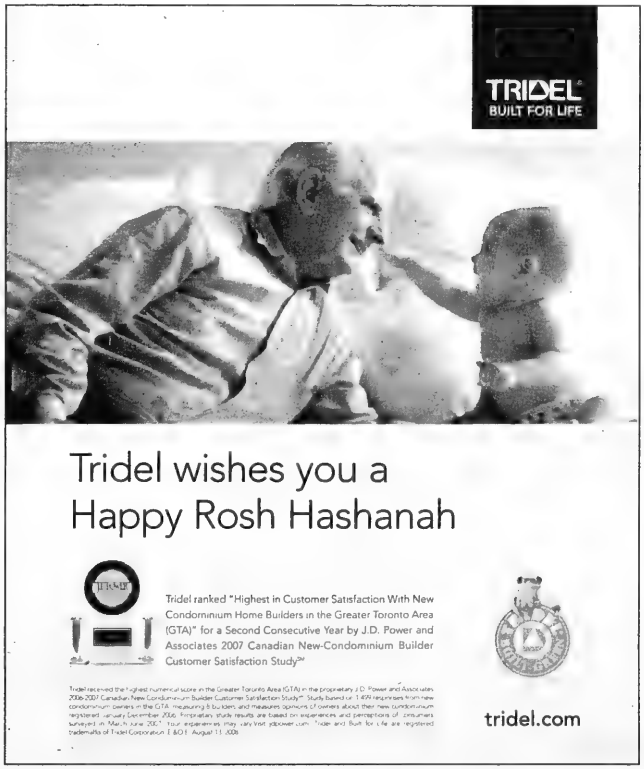
A MOMENTOUS OCCASION

Israel and its supporters around the world celebrated the country's 60th anniversary. [Isranet photo]





Les nouveaux espoirs des Juifs de France

DOV MAIMON

Trois événements positifs sont apparus au cours de ces dernières années en France, qui ont suscité des modifications évidentes au sein du judaïsme hexagonal, lequel constitue la troisième plus grande communauté juive du monde, après celles d'Israël et des États-Unis.

Il s'agit tout d'abord d'évoquer l'élection du président Nicolas Sarkozy, atlantiste convaincu qui a qualifié l'Etat hébreu de "véritable miracle du XXè siècle".

Ensuite, le ton des medias et l'atmosphère diplomatique, vis-à-vis de l'Etat hébreu, longtemps tenu pour le "principal responsable du conflit régional", sont désormais moins systématiquement négatifs. Conséquemment, la chute de l'Aliyah des juifs de France d'environ 30% (par rapport à l'année 2006) suggère que le malaise, voire le sentiment d'étrangeté à la communauté nationale, qui prédominaient au début de la seconde Intifada, tendent à se dissiper.

Enfin, l'arrivée de Gilles Bernheim au poste de Grand Rabbin, élu par deux tiers des 240 grands électeurs le 22 Juin 2008, représente à n'en pas douter une nouvelle phase dans la perception que les juifs ont d'eux-mêmes, de leur culture et traditions, et du rôle que celles-ci pourraient être appelées à jouer dans les affaires de la Cité. Ce philosophe et homme de culture de 56 ans, est d'une certaine manière l'antithèse rabbinique de son prédécesseur qui a privilégié, durant plus de deux décennies, une politique ultra-orthodoxe, dont certains tenants n'ont pas hésiter à pratiquer des formes "d'auto-ségrégation" communautaires.

Réchauffement franco-israélien

Dans un contexte mondial de violences proches (émeutes de novembre 2005 en France, menaces sur la liberté de la presse suite aux caricatures de Mahomet) et lointaines (régime des talibans, Darfour, Tchétchénie), les inquiétudes et les aspirations des israéliens ont commencé à devenir audibles et crédibles en France. L'Europe saisissait d'un seul coup qu'elle affrontait un problème avec certaines minorités ethniques et religieuses qui menaçaient l'ethos judéo-chrétien du vieux continent.

Ce changement d'atmosphère, inauguré depuis la fin du règne chiraquien, ne serait toutefois pas survenu sans l'élection de Sarkozy. Sans modifier fondamentalement l'ouverture envers les pays arabes, le président français, décidé de redonner à son pays un rôle de premier plan au Proche Orient, a successivement, et au grand soulagement de la communauté juive, affirmé le droit intangible d'Israël à exister, s'est engagé à une "tolérance-zéro" de l'antisémitisme et s'est libéré de l'axiome politiquement correct identifiant l'Etat juif au "plus grand obstacle à la coopération euroméditerranéenne".

Une communauté vibrante à la croisée des chemins

Fortement polarisée entre une minorité très active et une périphérie en voie d'assimilation, cette communauté de 500 000 personnes est traversée par des courants à la fois centrifuges et centripètes. Cette dynamique est profondément liée, d'une part, à la difficulté de s'affirmer comme juif dans un pays où le nom juif n'a pas toujours très bonne image, et d'autre part, au profil sociologique particulier de cette communauté.

Contrairement aux juifs américains, mais de façon relativement analogue aux sépharades d'Israël, les juifs français sont plus pratiquants aujourd'hui qu'ils ne l'étaient il y a 20 ans et 75% mangent casher à la maison. Ils se sont par ailleurs rapprochés ces dernières années des instances communautaires et ils sont globalement plus religieux que les français non juifs . Quand on les interroge sur le lieu où

Faire face aux enjeux

Suite de la page B17

Alors que ses prédécesseurs avaient un rôle représentatif et honorifique, le Grand Rabbin Joseph Haim Sitruk, originaire d'une famille traditionaliste tunisienne et formé sur le tard dans les yeshivot israéliennes, a bouleversé le rôle et la fonction du Grand Rabbin de France. Sur la base de sa devise "rejudaïser les juifs", laquelle fait référence au judaïsme ultra-orthodoxe comme modèle unique de judaïsme authentique, il a réussi à accroître substantiellement le noyau communautaire (de 28% en 1988 à 38% en 2007) en s'adressant principalement aux juifs encore empreints de traditionalisme et en usant d'un discours direct, à l'occasion nostalgique et émotionnel, parfois rieur, mais toujours bien construit. Doté d'un charisme exceptionnel, il a guidé des milliers vers une stricte observance de type Haredi, et des dizaines de milliers à resserrer leurs liens communautaires.

Cette démarche exclusive a toutefois ses limites: les juifs les plus intégrés intellectuellement et socialement à la culture française, souvent ashkénazes, n'adhèrent pas à ce discours -bien que gardant certaines traditions, beaucoup se sont mariés en dehors de la communauté-. Si à Boston, près de 50% des enfants de couples mixtes reçoivent une éducation juive, en France ceux-ci font figure de laissés pour compte. On peut toutefois douter de l'efficacité de cette approche d'exclusion puisqu'aujourd'hui en France 50% des juifs de moins de 35 ans vivent en couple mixte (à mettre en comparaison avec 35% au Canada et 25% en Australie) . En quelques années, l'ultra-orthodoxie, bien que ne représentant que 5 à 10% du judaïsme français, a délégitimé non seulement les approches réformées, libérales et conservatives mais également les approches orthodoxes ouvertes qui caractérisaient l'institution rabbinique française depuis sa fondation par Napoléon Bonaparte en 1807.

Le monopole ultra-orthodoxe a notamment des incidences dramatiques sur les écoles. Si un tiers des enfants juifs sont scolarisés à plein temps en école juive, un second tiers est inscrit dans des écoles privées catholiques. Pire, ces dernières années, un certain nombre de parents, souvent traditionalistes mais souhaitant donner à leurs enfants une éducation de qualité ouverte sur le monde, a retiré leurs enfants des structures juives. Aux yeux des observateurs, le besoin d'une offre plus diversifiée de scolarité juive se fait cruellement sentir.

Délaissant le séminaire rabbinique parisien, école des cadres qui préparait autrefois à la délicate gestion d'une communauté hétérogène et polymorphe, le Grand Rabbin a fortement encouragé les élèves zélés à étudier dans les excellentes yeshivot ultra-orthodoxes israéliennes. Parmi les milliers qui ont suivi cette voie, un nombre infime a choisi de revenir pour être rabbin en France. À défaut de cadres locaux, on a donc "importé" d'Israël des décisionnaires rabbiniques, férus de Talmud mais parlant peu ou pas le français. En conséquence, la France est aujourd'hui un pays où l'épreuve de la conversion, y compris pour les enfants de père juif, est une des plus infranchissables au monde.

Le 'rabbin dans la Cité' prend la tête du judaïsme français

Docteur en philosophie et ancien élève du séminaire parisien et de la prestigieuse académie talmudique ultra-orthodoxe de Brisk, à Jérusalem, Gilles Bernheim, qui définit son poste comme "rabbin des rabbins", a entamé depuis quinze ans une réflexion fondamentale sur les enjeux sociétaux. Son premier ouvrage, Un rabbin dans la Cité, traitait des questions liées à l'athéisme, l'homosexualité, le sida, la drogue, les sectes, l'exclusion, les familles recomposées, et les enfants des couples mixtes. Son dernier, publié en mars et co-écrit avec le Cardinal Philippe Barbarin, l'Archevêque de Lyon, présente, face au discours dominant fondé sur le relativisme moral, des réponses respectivement juives et catholiques. Souhaitant mettre fin à la polarisation au sein de la communauté, Bernheim est partisan d'une "orthodoxie intransigeante mais ouverte", apte à rassembler le plus grand nombre et qui ferait figure d'alternative à la dérive fondamentaliste. S'il a été élu malgré son manque d'expérience effective comme rabbin de communauté, c'est que de très nombreuses personnes en France, juives et non juives, attendent avec impatience l'émergence d'une nouvelle synthèse judéo-française pérenne et signifiante pour le XXIè siècle. Face aux enjeux à la fois externes (accommodation avec les musulmans, assimilation, antisémitisme) et internes (faillite financière des institutions juives, absence d'écoles de qualité, carence d'élites enseignantes et rabbiniques), on ne peut qu'encourager le Rabbin Bernheim à s'entourer des bonnes personnes pour se mettre au travail.

Autre renouvellement des élites qui confirme ce besoin de changement, deux scientifiques de renom partisans d'une restructuration, respectivement Joël Merguy au Consistoire Central et Richard Prasquier au CRIF, ont récemment pris la tête de deux des trois institutions juives nationales. Un sentiment d'urgence également partagé par Pierre Besnainou, Président du FSJU et ancien Président du Congrès Juif Européen, qui, lors de la conférence internationale célébrant les 60 ans d'Israël en mai dernier à Jérusalem, a officiellement convié la Diaspora et l'Etat d'Israël à aider, financièrement mais pas seulement la communauté juive française à se reconstruire. Les organisations juives mondiales sauront-elle répondre, cette fois-ci, à l'appel lancé? Telle est la question.

Dov Maimon is a fellow at the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute (JPPPI) in Jerusalem, where he co-ordinates the institute's activities in French-speaking countries.

Following the election in June of Rabbi Gilles Bernheim, an open-minded intellectual, as the new chief rabbi of France, Maimon discusses the hopes and challenges confronting French Jewry.

China, the Jewish People and Israel:

By SHALOM SALOMON WALD

In Canada, as well as in all other industrialized countries, China is increasingly making the news. Interest in the red giant reached a peak during the Beijing Olympics in August 2008 and the anti-Chinese demonstrations in the West that occurred before.

One of the main geopolitical changes of the 21st century will be a long-term transfer of global economic, political and military power from the West to Asia, first to China and later on also to India. These two nations are re-emerging as great powers – positions which they held during long periods in the past. China is already a crucial factor in the economy of virtually all countries of the world. It is one of the five veto-holding powers of the UN Security Council, and its collaboration is essential for the solution of all of the world's major problems, from global warming to the food and energy crisis to nuclear proliferation. This transfer of global power will also have far-reaching consequences for the Middle East, Israel and the Jewish people in general. In 2004 the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute in Jerusalem published a monograph 'China and the Jewish People – Old Civilizations in a New Era' by the author of this article, indicating some of these consequences:

• China's energy needs and its fast growing involvement in the Middle East and the wider Muslim world: China is the world's second largest oil consumer and importer after the United States, and one of the largest importers of oil from all Muslim countries (Middle East, Africa, and South-East Asia). These countries' trade and economic relations with China will soon be as important as their relations with any Western country. But oil, trade and investments are not the only pieces on China's Middle Eastern chess board. A battalion of Chinese combat soldiers is standing in Southern Lebanon as part of the UNIFIL contingent. China's voice is increasingly listened to in the Muslim world at a time when Western influence is declining there. China has been a neighbour of the Arabs and Iranians since time immemorial.

• China's Muslims: China's Muslim population is variously estimated at thirty million to fifty million people. Many of them live in China's "Far West", the Xinjiang Autonomous Region that is adjacent to Muslim Central Asia. Many of the borders, such as those with Pakistan, are relatively easy to cross. Moreover, Saudi Arabian and other Middle Eastern influence and investments are clearly visible in the architecture of thousands of mosques all over China. Currently, China's Muslims are increasingly attuned to the wider Muslim world. They are a source of serious, though never publicly admitted concern to the Chinese authorities, who have to watch their reactions to events in the Middle East and to Chinese policies there. Tensions do exist and occasionally a laconic communiqué, as in summer 2008, reveals clashes with, and acts of terrorism by Chinese Muslims.

• Chinese-American tensions: For the Chinese, the United States is by far the most important country. It is their single largest export market, the source of their largest currency reserves, the creator of most of the science and technology they need, the main ally of Japan, the key to the solution of the Taiwan question and more. But the United States is also feared for its military and naval bases all around China, its presumed meddling in China's internal troubles, for example in Tibet, its permanent criticism of China's human rights record and the anti-Chinese sentiments of a large part of the American people. In turn, the United States fears China and is increasingly ill at ease with the challenge of China's rise as a major political and economic rival. In the past, great powers have challenged the United States militarily – Imperial Germany in World War I, Nazi Germany and Japan in World War II, the Soviet Union during the Cold War – but never economically. Now China does just that. American criticism of China is fueled by a fear of this emerging super-power no less than by concerns about human rights and democracy.

And this is where, in the Chinese view, the Jews enter the picture. The Chinese believe in the power and influence of American Jews, expect them to remember that many Jews found a safe heaven in Shanghai during World War II while the West abandoned them and hope that Jews will contribute to a better understanding between China and the United States. There is a complex, triangular relationship between China, the Jewish people and Israel. One of the determinants of China's policy towards Israel is the belief (or illusion?) that Jews have a dominant position in the United States. This is also why China, including its media, reacted with anger to anti-Chinese statements by prominent American Jews in spring 2008, particularly a call by 168 rabbis to boycott the Beijing Olympics, based among other things on a grossly flawed and gratuitously insulting comparison between today's China and Nazi Germany. But American Judaism is not the only target of Chinese interest. There are other influential Jewish communities in countries that are important to China, and the vibrant Canadian community is not the least significant of these. Canadian Jews too could make their concerns about Israel, Iran and other matters known in Beijing. They have an advantage as Canada, in contrast to the United States, does not see China as a great power rival. Also, Canadian Jews are not unpatriotic when they converse with China as Jews – the Canadian Constitution encourages minorities to assert their identity.

Looking Toward Tomorrow

geopolitical challenges

• China's relations with Israel: China's attitude toward Israel is obviously influenced by all three of these factors. But they are not the only determinants of China's Israel policy. In January 1950 Israel was one of the first non-Communist countries to recognize the People's Republic of China, three months after its establishment. Chinese policy advisors still mention this to Jewish visitors as a way to express China's gratitude. China established normal diplomatic relations with Israel only in January 1992. In between were periods where China gave strong vocal (though only limited material) support to Israel's Arab enemies. However, already in the 1980's, Israel provided China secretly with agricultural technologies and even military hardware at a time when both countries faced severe military threats from the same hostile country, the Soviet Union. Since 1992, the links between China and Israel have grown in all sectors except for the military links that the United States forced Israel to break off in 2000. China has said that it wants all its links with Israel to continue and improve: it is as if it wanted to convey the message that, as an emerging super-power, it is in nobody's "pocket" and will acknowledges no dependence, not even on oil producers.

Thus, China has to cope with several conflicting policy objectives, and its attitudes toward Israel and the Jewish people in general must also be seen in an older historic and cultural context. China is, apart from Hindu India, the only great living civilization that has never known any anti-Semitism, largely because Christianity and Islam had no influence on Chinese mainstream culture. In China there are no holy books where the Jews are blamed for rejecting or killing God's son, or his Messiah, or his Prophet. There are many, until recently often positive stereotypes about Jews: they are rich, intelligent, influential, successful but sometimes crafty, and Jews can be great friends of China. Former U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger who initiated the historic encounter between President Richard Nixon and Chairman Mao in 1972 is revered in China to this day. Also, many respect Israeli achievements in agriculture and technology. This has given Jews and Israel a small, temporary advantage in China, a bit of "soft power", which is a useful asset to have in dealings with any great power. However, the Jews will keep this asset only if they make their history and culture better known in China and support the dedicated Chinese university scholars who teach and write about Judaism. A Jewish cultural policy could also utilize other tools: movies, TV, exhibitions. The Canadian Jewish community should support such endeavours.

And how about human rights in China? Surely Jews cannot ignore this issue which is a source of concern to Canada. However, they must be realistic about what they can achieve as Jews in the short term and think twice whether it is necessary to put forward their Jewish affiliation when they protest against human right violations by a country where Jews were always well treated. Moreover they should be aware that China perceives all Western human rights protests as part of a broader hostility and treats them as an external security problem and not as a moral issue. Is this so different from the way Israel reacts to foreign accusations? Bible and Talmud insist that the same law must be applied to everyone, without distinction. But this is not the way China is sometimes being treated. It is singled out for criticism while human rights violations by other countries, small or pro-Western, are ignored or treated in a low-key manner. All this does not mean that Jews can do nothing to further human rights in China. But they can do it only culturally, indirectly and over the long term. Chinese elites are open to foreign ideas, and the Jews attract their interest. What explains the Jewish influence in the West? What makes Jews tick? When it is explained that their holy books proclaim the sanctity of human life, demand independent and equal justice for all and defend the rights of the poor against the rich, the Chinese can hear the message. No need to mention China.

Thinking of Jerusalem

Archeology in Jerusalem after the Six Day War

By DAN BAHAT

The scientific study of Jerusalem started with the visit of the revered American Edward Robinson in Jerusalem in 1838. He was the first explorer who examined the ancient remains of the city without any preconceived biases and tried to understand them against the background of what he knew from the Scriptures or other literary sources. To this very day this is the way to combine archeological finds with knowledge from other sources.

When he came to the Holy Land, the country was under Turkish-Ottoman rule. Europeans were restricted by the authorities in their ability to freely explore the city. During the British mandate (1917-1948) access throughout the city was also limited due primarily to the animosity of its inhabitants. Scholars complained quite regularly about their lack of free passage.

Therefore, when we try to evaluate the results of pre-1967 excavations in Jerusalem one can say that the excavations were carried out mostly in limited areas and that every dig raised more questions than answers. The public wanted to know more about the history of the city and about the various sites therein. But information was not forthcoming.

Even religious considerations played a role in interfering with the work of the archeologists and in their scientific conclusions. The excavations of Dame Kathleen Kenyon are illustrative.

Dame Kathleen discovered the remains of a large public building close to the Temple Mount. The Jordanian authorities, however, believed that she had discovered a church and thus removed her and her team of scholars from the site. When Israeli archeologists returned to the same site after the Six Day War, it was found that the site was a Muslim structure dating from the 8th century, and indeed, a unique example of such a structure.

The situation changed with the Six Day War in June, 1967.

Jerusalem became an open city where any scholar could study archeological remains without any limits to his or her academic freedom.

It was only natural that Israeli archeologists, for whom the city had been essentially hermetically sealed during Jordanian rule (1948-1967), started to explore the past of their historical capital city.

Indeed, since the State of Israel was founded in 1948, the Hebrew University in Jerusalem has trained skilled archeologists whose training on large scale excavations such as Hazor and Masada has raised young generations of archeologists whose zeal and curiosity to know ancient Jerusalem drove them to dig there, guided by such famous professors such as Professor Benjamin Mazar who commenced the excavations at the south-western corner of the Temple Mount and Professor N. Avigad who worked in the Jewish Quarter.

Walls and roads uncovered after 1967

Immediately after the 1967 war, much new construction, building and development were initiated. According to Israeli law, however, new construction or demolition or similar such work requires the consent of the Antiquities Authorities. Many excavations were begun in and around the Old City of Jerusalem. Some excavation sites were small but others were of a scale similar to the long and involved excavations elsewhere in the country that required many years of digging.

Thus, as a result of the new excavations after 1967, it is clear that many problems pertaining to free access and study in and of the Holy City were solved. It is also clear that in spite of the many excavations that took place in Jerusalem over the preceding hundred years, we can say that the more recent excavations have contributed far more to adding to the knowledge of the history and archeology of Jerusalem than did the earlier digs.

An archival photo of the Western Wall on the eve of the Six Day War.

About the city's history, one could not say until recently when it was actually first settled.

Because of the presence of the only permanent, perennial water spring at the foot of the hill of the City of David, we know that people were already settled there in the Neolithic period, namely in the 7th-9th millennium BCE.

It is difficult, however, to decide with precision exactly when within the Neolithic period the city was settled as archeologists reached this level of early period settlement only within a very small area. Usually, when an archeologist digs, the lower he reaches, the smaller the available area becomes for his research. If our conclusion is correct that the first settlers of Jerusalem were from the Neolithic period, then we can say that Jerusalem becomes one of the oldest and continuously settled cities in the world.

The subsequent period however - the Chalcolithic period, thus named as stone and copper were the materials by which tools and vessels were made - occupies most of the 4th millennium BCE. Remains from this period have also been found in Jerusalem, but alas, again in too small an exposed area.

One should keep in mind that the findings of the human activity from both Neolithic and Chalcolithic times, and of course also in later historical periods, occurred in a tiny hill south of the Temple Mount whose size is only 10 hectares.

The founders of the city and their followers chose this hill because that was the only place where water was and is available. The spring, the Gihon, was the reason for the development of the city.

Although it is a comparatively low hill, its slopes are still steep enough to serve as protection to its inhabitants from unfriendly forces as one can deduce from the biblical description of David's conquest of the city around 1000 BCE. Archeological finds from subsequent periods have also been discovered on this important hill providing information about the links in the long chain of the city's history.

Thinking of Jerusalem

Recent excavations yield fascinating finds

Today we are able to cast light on the initial period when Jerusalem became a holy place.

Although we cannot say with full confidence when the name was given to the city, we do know its name means "the god Shalem has founded it." The god Shalem was the god of night in the Canaanite pantheon. Along with his twin brother, Shahar, they both created the full 24 hour cycle of the day. In the book of Genesis the city is named only Shalem.

But the sanctity of the city can also be deduced by the name of its most important and best-known mountain: Mount Moriah. This name means foundation. It is from this spot that the world was founded!

The meaning of Moriah is explained, in the story of the binding of Isaac in the Book of Genesis. The ascent to the mountain is alluded to as the compulsory pilgrimage to the mountain, to the place where "God can be seen" (as the Bible refers to it).

Study of the Temple Mount suggests that some of the ancient cisterns on the Mount were likely used as burial caves dating as far back as the Middle Bronze age, roughly the second millennium BCE. Such burial sites could explain the reason for the initial consecration of the site. The sages of the Second Temple period were aware of the use of the space as a cemetery. The sacred Temple precinct was constructed "over the Tomb of the Void" (Kever HaTehom, in Hebrew).

The archeologists are still looking for an explanation for the lack of archeological remains from the 19th century BCE as it is at that time that Jerusalem is mentioned in non-biblical writings - the so-called execration texts - Egyptian documents that mention sites in the Middle East that they subdued and conquered. Jerusalem is mentioned twice but no relevant remains have yet been found of this in the city.

The next period is generally believed to be the period of the Patriarchs.

The biblical description of their lives matches well with what is known from archeology. Indeed it is at this point that Jerusalem is mentioned for the first time in the Bible because of its king, Malchizedek, "a priest of the most high god." The impression created in the Bible is that Jerusalem is indeed a large city.

Recent excavations carried out on the hill of the City of David have brought to light very fascinating finds of that period. There was a strong fortification system consisting of walls and towers. These fortifications served the city for more than a thousand years; they were destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar the Chaldean in 586 BCE when the first Temple was also destroyed. A long section of the alignment of the city walls was excavated by the archeological expedition in 1978-1984 and is still being dug by the project under way in the City of David.

This tile canal was a water carrier for the people of Jerusalem at the time of the Second Temple. [Israel photo]

A surprising discovery was the fact that at that time the Gihon Spring was heavily fortified by strong towers that were built of very large stones. The towers created an enclosure of sorts to which water from the Gihon was diverted.

It was also at that period that a channel was carved in the rock bringing water from the spring to the Pool of Siloam. This channel is today one of the highlights of a visit to the City of David.

Ancient cisterns were likely used as burial caves

In 1868 Charles Warren discovered an underground passage that fittingly enough is now called Warren's Shaft. It is believed to be the tsinor (passageway) mentioned in 2 Samuel as the means used by King David to penetrate into the city. However, because of new discoveries pertaining to the water installations on the Mount, archeologists working in Jerusalem reject this conclusion entirely and look for other meaning to the word tsinor in 2 Samuel.

Inside the city only scant archeological remains have been found.

There is no doubt that the city was inhabited then but later periods of habitation destroyed the remains from preceding times. The great works of construction, however, leave no doubt that the city was quite densely inhabited.

When King David besieged Jerusalem the walls and towers he saw in front of him were the fortifications that are described here. The difficulties David encountered attempting to capture Jerusalem are described in detail in 2 Samuel as well as in 2 Chronicles.

The city is mentioned again in 14th century BCE letters written to the pharaoh of Egypt. These letters were written on behalf of the Canaanite king of Jerusalem and contain requests for help in defending the city against its foes. The strong house where the king lived is also mentioned there.

Digs on the hill of the City of David yielded an enormous structure comprised of an embankment covered by stone. This structure was a matter of dispute among archeologists after its initial discovery in 1925 and then during further exploration in the '60s and then by Israeli archeologists in the '80s.

Today one can say with confidence that it is difficult to identify the initial builder of this structure. But we can say that King David was indeed the one to cover it with stones. A recent discovery of an imposing public building within the enclosure created by this structure enables us to better understand the greatness of the Davidic dynasty and their legacy in Jerusalem.

A long-standing dispute about the size of biblical Jerusalem was resolved once and for all by archeological explorations of the city after 1967. Was biblical Jerusalem built only on the small hill of the City of David or was it larger than that?

Pool of Siloam a highlight of a visit to City of David

Once the Jewish Quarter was rebuilt after having been in ruins under Jordanian rule, a large area was available for excavation by archeologists. Until then all the excavations were carried out in small areas. Scholars were unable to get the full picture of the various sites. The rehabilitation of the Jewish Quarter was a golden opportunity to learn what happened in this area during the long history of the city.

The Jewish Quarter is located on a triangular-shaped hill, comprising Mount Zion, the Armenian Quarter and the Jewish Quarter. It was Josephus Flavius in the 1st century A.D. who dubbed the hill "Zion" and so it is named to this day.

It was soon discovered that the entire hill, far larger than the City of David, was settled during the reign of King Hezekiah in the 8th century BCE. In addition, we can now understand certain phrases in the Bible that were unclear before.

In the year 722 BCE, the kingdom of Israel with its capital in Samaria was subdued by the Assyrians and many were forced into exile.

But many of the displaced Jews settled in Jerusalem. The hill of the City of David could not possibly accommodate so many newcomers and so they started to settle in the hill of Zion. (Archeologists call it the Western Hill.)

We read in Josephus Flavius that the city wall of that period actually preceded the existence of the "First Wall" of the Second Temple period. Now we can understand the dimension of the expansion of the city in the last two hundred years of the First Temple period.

In Isaiah 22:10 the prophet admonishes the king for building a city wall, destroying houses and bringing water into the city instead of repenting and "doing good in the eyes of the Lord."

Indeed, since the exiles from the kingdom of Israel settled the hill before the wall was constructed, many of their homes were in the path of the wall. The homes were demolished.

Until the 8th century BCE the city of Jerusalem was indeed limited to the hill of the City of David. It grew afterward. King Solomon annexed the Temple area to the city. (The term Temple Mount did not exist before the very last days of the first Temple period).

The early days of the Second Temple are little known. Building and construction were so extensive during the Maccabean period and the subsequent Herodian period that they erased the works of the preceding periods.

Tractate Middoth of the Mishnah provides the only hint of earlier public works in Jerusalem. It probably describes a phase in the development of the Temple Mount, probably during the 3rd-2nd century BCE. The enlarged Temple Mount is described in writings of Jewish writers from Alexandria.

Digging on the Temple Mount today is not allowed. Thus Israeli archeologists have been digging just outside the retaining walls of the Mount since 1968. (The Western Wall is one of four retaining walls. But it is the one best preserved).

The Mazar expedition worked along the southern wall. Along with the Ministry of Religious Affairs of the government of Israel I worked along the Western Wall.

The results of these excavations are simply amazing. They cast a great deal of information about the work of Herod the Great.

The entire area abutting the walls was cleared to facilitate the excavations and other work.

The area is covered in mikva'ot (ritual baths) which shows the determination of the Jewish people to preserve the purity of the Mount. Recently even a mikvah for vessels and tools was uncovered. A segment of the bridge connecting the western hill with the Temple Mount was also discovered. This bridge carried the aqueduct water from Solomon's Pools, south of Bethlehem, to the Temple of Jerusalem.

Thinking of Jerusalem

Herod's work was majestic

The approach to the Temple Mount from the south was by an enormous stairway. That stairway is now exposed to the public. According to the Mishnah, the rabbis stood there to expound the law and one of the three courts of Jerusalem was located on the steps. It was a rallying place for the many thousands of people, among them many pilgrims, who visited the Mount.

The exposure of the walls shows the enormity of Herod's works on the Mount and it makes it one of the largest and most majestic structures in all antiquity.

The street running along the Western Wall was excavated in a few segments; its course is clear to us today. It was paved with large slabs of stone all of which were dressed with the typical Herodian pattern of a frame cut into the stone on all sides.

Store shops abutted the wall; their fronts faced the street. They were all destroyed by the conflagration in 70 CE. Traces of the fire can be seen on the walls of the Mount. The fire was so strong that even the huge Herodian stones were affected by the searing heat. The remaining traces of the conflagration however, enable us to trace the alignment of the vaults that formed the ceilings of these shops.

There were four gates to the Mount from the west. Josephus Flavius describes them in his work. All four are known to us today. Thanks to the excavation of the Western Wall tunnels, the only gate that was not visible before, is now visible to the visitor. This gate is named after Charles Warren who recognized and identified it from inside the Temple Mount (1867-1868) before he was expelled by the Muslim authorities. The discovery of that unseen gate enables us to follow its history into the medieval era.

Between 135-638 CE, Jews were not allowed to live in the city. But they refused to submit to this edict of prohibition and they managed here and there to come to the city secretly.

An inscription quoting Isaiah 66:10 was carved into the Western Wall showing the persistence of the Jews in visiting the Holy City. After the Muslim conquest of Jerusalem, Jews settled in the city again. They were also allowed to do some chores on the Mount such as cleaning and filling the oil lamps. The Jews found the gate that is the closest to the Holy of Holies. The place near the gate became the main and most revered synagogue in Jerusalem. The many letters between the Jews of Egypt and the Jews of Jerusalem attests to this.

But by 716 CE the Muslim authorities had a change of heart. Jews were no longer allowed to visit. During the period of Muslim rule over Jerusalem it is worth noting that four palaces were built in the 8th century.

Due to the excavations along the Western Wall, we may see some of the largest stones ever quarried and carved by man. Adjacent to Warren's Gate, there are four enormous stones. They comprise what archeologists call "The Master's Course" as they weigh hundreds of tonnes. We believe that they were installed there in order to serve as a counter-force supporting a storage place below the floor of the Mount. There is no way to prove this theory, of course.

But if true, then we can confirm that there were significant underground installations under the Mount, as mentioned in the Mishnah.

At the northern-most end of the Tunnels some remains from Maccabean times were uncovered that were partially destroyed when Herod built up the Temple Mount. The most impressive is an aqueduct bored into the bedrock. It was cut from the surface, reaching the level of a cistern on the mount, thus creating an incision of some 12 metres.

It is so impressive that we can only guess what other projects were undertaken by the Maccabees of which we are unaware today. Herod's works were so well secured to the bedrock that no remains of the structures that preceded him were preserved.

On the western hill of the city which today is the Jewish Quarter, we have discovered significant remains from the Second Temple period.

The view of the Temple Mount and its precincts from this part of the city is beautiful. An inscription discovered in one of the houses there suggests that it must have been the neighbourhood of the priests. The inscription bears the name of Bar-Kathros, a priestly family notorious for its venomous use of the pen. The remains of their house and that of their neighbours show that the families were exceptionally rich. The homes featured mosaic floors, frescos on the walls and lavishly decorated ceilings. Remains of the First Temple period were uncovered under their homes.

Needless to say, many archeological remains from later periods have also been discovered. Remains from the Roman city, built upon the ruins of the Second Temple in the second century CE, begin to show up. The city is a Byzantine city when the Roman Empire becomes Christian and Jerusalem is made its spiritual capital. This resulted in great growth for the city including the construction of a city wall, a number of churches and other major installations.

Of special importance was the discovery of the "Nea" church. The name of this church means the New (Greek letter N) Mother (of the Lord) church. It was built by Emperor Justinian in 540 CE, and according to his historian, the vessels of the Temple that were looted from Rome were brought to this church. From Karaite records we know that this was the only church destroyed by the Muslims when they conquered Jerusalem in 638 CE. It must have been an important church for the Muslims to have decided not to leave it standing.

Also uncovered intact by recent digs is a thoroughfare of stores in the Jewish Quarter which was the 12th century CE Crusader market. It is known as the Cardo as it is built over the 6th century CE Byzantine main street (cardo) of the city and is still used today.

Archeologists have also been able to show to the public the remains from the Muslim period of rule in the Jewish Quarter comprising the Fatimid city wall (11th century CE) as well as the fortifications of the Ayyubid (13th century CE) period.

Many of the archeological sites described in this essay are installed today for visitors to see and through them to imagine and understand the development of the city through the ages.

Dan Bahat teaches archeology at Bar Ilan University in Israel and at St. Michael's College in Toronto. He is also the former chief archeologist of Jerusalem.

Thinking of Jerusalem

We won't let them sever us from our history

From the editor's desk

The ancient rabbis who compiled the liturgy for Yom Kippur made it especially long. They added two prayer services to the usual daily three. And they incorporated special content in all of the services to steer worshippers' thoughts to intense personal introspection and to frequently recurring liturgical reminders of collective, communal inter-connection.

Individuality-and-peoplehood is the formula of all Jewish prayer. We strengthen the individual by inspiring a sense of belonging to a people; we strengthen the people by including all individuals who wish to belong.

On Yom Kippur, we feel the formula throughout the day. Even personal pleas for forgiveness are expressed in the plural.

The rabbis made their best efforts to penetrate our souls with the feeling of security that flows from knowing we share common language, common petitions and common history with our fellow worshippers.

No name, no place, no image could more forcefully symbolize and reinforce that common history than the name and evocation of "Jerusalem."

All our prayers on all our holy occasions are replete with references and allusions to Jerusalem. But on Yom Kippur the liturgy itself is borrowed from the days of Temple worship in Jerusalem.

"Since antiquity," wrote Ismar Elbogen nearly a century ago in his seminal work Jewish Liturgy: A Comprehensive History, "the Avoda (a description of the service of the high priest in the Temple on the Day of Atonement) was incorporated into the Amidah (Shmoneh Esrei). Today, it is attached only to the additional service (Musaf) on Yom Kippur."

The fifth and concluding service of the day, the Neilah, Elbogen also points out, was retained from the Neilat Shearim (the prayer recited in ancient times at the closing of the gates of the Temple) and incorporated into the Yom Kippur liturgy.

Jerusalem, the actual place and its idealized memory, are deeply embedded into the very essence of the Yom Kippur service. That is because Jerusalem is the very sinew that holds together the disparate strands of our peoplehood.

This is not simply a trite restatement of what to most of us is obvious and a key aspect of who we are as Jewish human beings.

There are many people today who deny the Jewish link to Jerusalem, who strive with all the malicious intent in their hearts, to sever us from our history and to persuade the world that it is right and just to do so.

The most famous attempt recently to disconnect Jewish history from Jerusalem was that by former Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat.

Arafat's abstruse and distorted view of Jewish history

In an interview in 2002 with Saida Hamad, the Ramallah correspondent for the London Arabic-language daily Al-Hayat, Arafat said, "For 34 years, they [the Israelis] have dug tunnels, the most dangerous of which is the great tunnel. They found not a single stone proving that the Temple of Solomon was there, because historically the Temple was not in Palestine [at all]. They found only remnants of a shrine of the Roman Herod. Now they have prevented the [Ministry of] Religious Endowments from monitoring the renovation of the southern wall of the Haram. But we are following this matter in an international framework, and you will see that the entire world is on our side in this matter…"

It is widely known that the Camp David peace talks in 2000 foundered in large part on Arafat's abstruse and distorted view of Jewish history. As reported earlier this month in the Economist (Sept. 15), "Yasser Arafat... infuriated Bill Clinton [then America's president] and Israeli negotiators by repeatedly denying there ever was a Jewish Temple on the site [the Temple Mount] and rejecting proposals to share sovereignty over it."

Yet Arafat has not been the only Palestinian or Arab leader to propound such views of Jerusalem.

On Aug. 25, 2000, Mahmoud Abbas, now the leader of the Palestinian Authority, told radio Kul Al-Arab:

"[The Israelis] claim that 2,000 years ago they had a Temple [on the Temple Mount]. I challenge the claim that this is so. But even if it is so, we do not accept [current Israeli claims on the Temple Mount]."

The Tower of David and Citadel Compound [Israel Sun photo]

On Dec. 28, 2001, the Higher Islamic Authority of Palestine told the Al-Quds newspaper that "the claims being made by the rulers of Israel and its rabbis about the alleged Temple are pure fabrications without any base or foundation."

Such statements by prominent Arab politicians, theologians and academics are frequently expressed in public. Prof. Yitzhak Reiter recently wrote about them in The CJN (July 10 and 17.)

It is therefore no mere idle musing or alarmist's ploy to call upon Jews, especially on the eve of our High Holidays, to take to heart this behaviour by Israel's enemies and to determine resolutely to oppose them.

'Diaspora Jews should be involved'

The question for Diaspora Jews, however, is how, on a practical level, can we do so? How can we oppose Israel's enemies in their efforts to undermine the Jewish claim to Jerusalem?

JPPPI strategy

The Jewish People Planning Policy Institute (JPPPI), the Jerusalem-based think-tank established by the Jewish Agency, some of whose scholars have written essays for this Rosh Hashanah supplement, published a paper last year that helps us respond to the question.

Titled A Strategic Plan for the Strengthening of Jerusalem as the Civilizational Capital of the Jewish People, the paper prescribes a comprehensive course of action for the enhancement and ultimate strengthening of Jerusalem. It is a superb document.

The main objective of the report "is to develop policy directions for strengthening the standing of Jerusalem as the civilizational (including spiritual, cultural, religious, social and more) capital of the Jewish people."

The report, however, goes far beyond merely wishful thinking. It speaks both in general and in specific terms.

Yehezkel Dror, the founding president of the institute, makes plain the institute's awareness that practical as well as idealistic steps must carry the day.

"For sure," Dror writes, "obtaining an agreement on the future of Jerusalem, its boundaries and its international recognition will ease the task of making it into the civilizational capital of the Jewish people and may in part be essential for significantly enhancing its global standing as a whole. But taking vigorous action to strengthen Jerusalem as the civilizational capital of the Jewish people does not depend on a political agreement and neither needs nor should wait for it. Furthermore, strengthening the civilizational standing of Jerusalem may help [Israelis and Palestinians] to reach an agreement meeting Jewish aspirations while recognizing the significance of Jerusalem for Christianity and Islam."

Typically, the institute offers a detailed plan of policy directions and recommendations.

Its recommendations are forthright and quite sweeping. Among them, is the categorical statement aimed at us, the Jews of the Diaspora.

"Diaspora Jews should be involved in making Jerusalem into the civilizational capital of the Jewish people, in addition to being the capital of the State of Israel."

The report then offers a detailed, radically innovative blueprint for doing so.

"As an overall grounding for the suggested policy directions, it is recommended that Jerusalem emphasize the connection between its past and its present and future, developing its civilizational heritage and mission and using its cultural and religious bases to voice central Jewish messages and values to Jews and humanity." (My emphasis.)

Thinking of Jerusalem

Jerusalem Foundation key stakeholder

Diaspora Jews can choose from among a number of causes, institutions, organizations and foundations to strengthen Jerusalem, specifically, to help "Jerusalem emphasize the connection between its past and its present and future."

One of them is the Jerusalem Foundation, the non-profit organization started by Teddy Kollek just beforer the Six Day War, whose mission is the building of Jerusalem in the widest sense of the verb. I have often written about the exceptional work of the foundation. Indeed the JPPPI specifically lists the foundation as one of the main stakeholders in their recommendations for the strengthening of Jerusalem.

The Jerusalem Foundation

"Jerusalem reflects the hope and meaning of Jewish existence and continuity," writes the foundation in its mission statement.

During this past summer, The CJN visited Jerusalem at the invitation of the Jerusalem Foundation to observe some of the projects sponsored by the foundation. Of particular interest were projects dedicated to expanding our understanding of the city's far distant past. We, therefore, visited a number of archeological sites, ongoing digs and enhancement projects supported by the foundation.

We began our tour, fittingly, at Migdal David, the Tower of David, at the Museum of the History of Jerusalem.

Migdal David

The view from Migdal David is absolutely transformative. In all directions it stuns the soul. It was described to us as "the beginning of Jerusalem."

Standing on the roof of the tower museum, one breathes deeply the unique feeling of standing at the centre of history and culture, at the crossroad of desert and mountain, of east and west, of time and space.

Jerusalem is the meeting place, eventually, for all Jews. This is borne out by the fact that our guide, Rachel Afarsimone, was born in Israel, her father in Lithuania, her mother in Uruguay.

She narrates for us a brief history of the very spot on which we are standing and walking.

The tower, also known as David's Citadel, imposes itself onto the landscape. Its stones were laid as a fortification by the Hashmona'im (the dynasty founded by the Maccabees) in the second century BCE. Most scholars think this was done under the direction of Jonathan.

Upon the base of the stones from the Hashmona'i period, there are the formidable stones from the period of Herod.

Herodian stones are easily identified due to the fact that their surfaces were smoothed, unlike the stones from the Hashmona'i period, which bulged and retained their roughly hewn look. Herodian stones were also "dressed" with a decorative line framing the surface near the edge of all four sides.

The tower was a military fortress specifically situated on the mount to protect Jerusalem from invaders who came from the north. To the east, south and west, the city was protected by the natural geographic barriers of desert, valley and mountain respectively.

The next significant building in the citadel area came during Crusader times, about 1,000 years after Herod, in 1099 AD.

King Baldwin, the Christian ruler of Jerusalem, decided to build where Herod's palace had been. The king allowed some Jews to return to the Jaffa Gate area and to make their living there as dyers. They became very proficient in this industry as was chronicled in the 11th century by Benjamin of Tudela.

We stand high atop the rampart touching the stones of the wall that Suleiman built between 1537 and 1541. Our guide tells us that he probably built the wall to demonstrate Jerusalem's importance to the wider world or because he feared for a new crusade.

Prior to Suleiman, the Mamelukes, who originated in Asia, ruled the city. They were expert cavalry. The Ayubids, the Muslim dynasty founded by Salah a-Din, hired the Mamelukim to protect him. During the Mameluke period, Jerusalem was open, unwalled, unprotected.

The panorama of the history that we can see on the ramparts of the citadel is told to great effect in the Museum of the History of Jerusalem, which is now part of the citadel structure.

The Kishlei

From the citadel museum we walked to a newer archeological site on the grounds of the tower: the Kishlei.

The name is Turkish for military outpost. In Ottoman times, the Kishlei was a prison. The British continued that particular gruesome use during mandatory times. Many Jews who struggled against British rule and on behalf of Jewish independence were locked up there.

The project being sponsored by the Jerusalem Foundation and the Israel Antiquities Authority is titled "Inside the Kishlei." It will eventually become an archeological and educational exhibit for tourists and Israelis alike.

The work began in 2000-01 and is in need of a boost.

Could they speak to us, other than through our own imaginations, the stones of the prison walls could tell the harrowing stories of the many unfortunates who were shut away there, many of them left there for dead. The walls of Kishlei, indeed the fortress itself, are massive and immovably stable because Herod's stones go all the way to the foundation rock. How ironic that even 2,000 years after he lived, Herod's harsh, iron-fisted predispositions were felt in the land.

Solomon's Quarry or Hezekiah's Cave

East of the Damascus Gate in the Old City is the entrance to a cave known by two names: Solomon's Quarry and Hezekiah's Cave. Some 9,000 square metres in area, the cave goes for about 230 metres southward from its point of entry reaching to the Via Dolorosa under the Muslim Quarter.

Scientists are not sure when the place was first used as a quarry, but they are certain that stones were quarried from there at the time of the Second Temple. Archeologists conjecture that the rocks were removed through a combination of the use of a wooden tip and water pressure.

Signs of quarrying rock from the cave walls are ubiquitous. The orange and yellow light in the vast cavern illuminate its walls and smooth spaces to the farthest reaches of the large, amazing carved-out hollow under the Old City.

The Bible relates how thousands of men were recruited by King Solomon to build his structures and holy spaces. They bent their backs and broke their fingers in the dark precincts of this cave. One can almost hear them; one can almost see them. But for the fact that this is the very spot in which they worked, the vast place could be a movie set for a biblical epic. But it is not. The place is the very cave discovered in 1854 by Charles Warren (Warren conducted the first major excavations of Jerusalem, thereby ushering in a new age of biblical archeology).

The Herodian Quarter

There are two museums situated in the Jewish Quarter of the Old City. They are under homes occupied once again by Jews. The museums show how Jews lived at the time of the destruction of the Second Temple. The museums are known as The Burnt House and the Herodian Quarter. In essence, however, they are one neighbourhood from the past.

The artifacts collected here are remarkable. They are the utensils used by the occupants of the home in the course of their daily lives. It is apparent from the remnants of elaborate decorations of the frescoes on the walls and the mosaics on the floors that the people who lived there enjoyed a high standard of living. They were obviously observant and well-to-do.

"What we see in the Herodian Quarter," our guide tells us "is clearly the remains of a neighbourhood."

The people who lived here looked onto the Temple Mount. We can only imagine the view from their homes, the open air, the expanse of sky and high wall, pilgrims, busy activity, bustle and holiness. It must have exhilarated them in the same way that its mere thought exhilarates our imaginations.

"The water systems of old still work today," our guide Jacques Neguer says. "We see this especially when the rains fall. There is no doubt that the people who lived here respected the laws of purity and impurity (taharah and tumah).

The museum in the Herodian Quarter is to be refurbished and expanded. Like all of the museums and archeological sites in the Old City, it stakes and reconfirms our historical claim to the place that crystallized our collective sense of nation and peoplehood.

Last month, Eilat Mazar of the Hebrew University announced a significant discovery in the City of David at the south end of the Old City ramparts near the Dung Gate.

According to the press release from the dig, a 2,600-year-old clay seal impression, or bulla, bearing the name Gedaliah ben Pashur was recently uncovered completely intact during archeological excavations.

The name Gedaliah ben Pashur appears in the Book of Jeremiah (38:1) together with that of Yehuchal ben Shelemayahu, whose name was found on an identical clay bulla in the same area in 2005. The two men were ministers in the court of King Zedekiah, the last king to rule in Jerusalem before the destruction of the First Temple.

Mazar said that this is the first time in the annals of Israeli archeology that two clay bullae with two Biblical names that appear in the same verse in the Bible have been unearthed in the same location.

It is enough to cause goosebumps.

One of the most important messages from the various excavations in the Old City is that 2,000 years ago and even before, this was a Jewish neighbourhood. Jewish life thrived here some 2,000 years ago.

It is a message we must not hesitate to share with the rest of the world and especially with those individuals intent on harming Israel.

In his book, Emil Fackenheim: A Jewish Philosopher's Response to the Holocaust (Syracuse University Press), David Patterson writes that for Fackenheim, Jerusalem was not just a place of residence – it was a fundamental category in his thinking as a Jew. He understood that our understanding of Jerusalem shapes our understanding of ourselves as Jews. Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel once said that whatever we are as Jews lies in what the Sabbath means to us. So it is with Jerusalem: whatever we are as Jews lies in what Jerusalem means to us.

At this time of year, it is fitting that we ask ourselves that very question: what does Jerusalem mean to us?

Jerusalem needs us.

We need Jerusalem.

Let us join in the effort to strengthen it.

Durban redux? Vitriol may follow Israel to Geneva

By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
JTA

In less than a year, the United Nations will try again to tackle the thorny questions of racism around the world. Its effort in 2001 devolved into a virulent attack on Israel and Jews.

Indeed, the anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, reportedly has become something of a dreaded "D word" in some diplomatic circles, prompting widespread concern that the follow-up could be a repeat of the anti-Israel extravaganza seven years ago.

While it's too early to tell which groups hostile to Israel will show up at the follow-up conference to be held in Geneva in April, there are some hints about what treatment awaits the Jewish state.

At least two Palestinian organizations have declared publicly their intent to carry the crusade launched in Durban to Geneva.

That crusade paints Israel as an "apartheid state" like the South Africa of old to be similarly crippled through boycotts, divestment and sanctions. And by most accounts, even more pro-Palestinian groups are sure to arrive in Geneva to trumpet their cause celebre.

At the 2001 World Conference Against Racism in Durban, the rabid activism of numerous anti-Israel nongovernmental organizations, or NGOs, virtually drowned out much of the world's other ills.

Last month in Brazil, at the first regional meeting to determine the substance of next year's conference, one group hinted at what to expect.

BADIL: The Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights issued an open letter to the "Latin American people, its governments, movements and organizations."

The letter stated: "The world's imperial powers, with the United States and Israel at the forefront, are putting pressure on states" to "silence the principled voices of the victims of racism."

Latin America should resist, the letter said, because "the struggle against Israel's colonial apartheid regime is one of the cornerstones of the struggle against state-sponsored racism and ongoing colonial policies worldwide."

BADIL was not present in Durban.

A second group created since Durban also recently sought and gained accreditation to the Geneva conference. The Palestinian Grassroots Anti-Apartheid Wall Campaign, is at the forefront of the international boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel.

It's too soon to know which funding agencies will help send NGOs such as BADIL and the Wall Campaign to Geneva, but one watchdog suggests European money will likely be involved.

The Ford Foundation, the powerful U.S-based philanthropy whose money fueled much of the anti-Israel activity at Durban has opted out of this event in Geneva.

"European aid agencies give tens of millions of euros per year to very political, in some cases radical, anti-Israel NGOs, and these groups are the most active in the Durban process," said Gerald Steinberg, the executive director of the Jerusalem-based NGO Monitor, which recently detailed these links in its report Europe's Hidden Hand.

Dry Bones DURBAN II

Conference will likely cost 'several million'

"There are many officials in those agencies who come from an anti-colonialist, anti-American, anti-Israel political ideology," Steinberg said, "and they have almost no supervision, almost no open discussions in their parliaments over these budgets."

European Union officials told JTA that none of its grants are explicitly for NGOs to attend conferences, like the Durban follow-up, but rather are directed toward specific projects.

Beyond the Durban process, the EU officials say a grantee's words — like branding Israel as apartheid or endorsing boycotts — are the "sole responsibility" of the grantee and do not reflect EU positions.

The anti-Israel atmosphere was established by demonstrations such as this. [RNS photo]

Brussels "cannot be held responsible" for these statements, nor can it "oblige them to refrain" from making them, said David Kriss, a spokesman for the European Commission delegation to Israel.

"The Commission is respectful of freedom of expression as a key feature of a democratic society," Kriss wrote in an e-mail from his office in Ramat Gan, Israel. "An open debate over political issues is indispensable on the way towards better mutual understanding.

"At the same time, the Commission is firmly committed to the fight against incitement to hatred between ethnic or religious groups as well as to the expressions of racism, xenophobia, discrimination, anti-Semitism or Islamophobia, and will continue fighting these deplorable phenomena."

The 2009 Durban follow-up will likely cost "several million dollars," according to a UN official in Geneva, with UN member-states expected to foot the entire bill.

Few, however, have ponied up so far. Some $750,000 left over from the 2001 event is now being used, said the UN official, with Russia recently adding a contribution of $250,000 and China another $20,000.

Other countries have pledged funds but not yet delivered, which is typical among member-states that sometimes promise money but are slow to act.

Meanwhile, the United States, Israel and France have threatened to boycott the event, saying it should focus on racism and discrimination generally, not stir the Middle East conflict.

Canada has withdrawn from the conference

Canada has withdrawn from the conference saying it would not remedy the mistakes of Durban.

The American and Israeli delegations both walked out of Durban in disputes over language that sought to equate Zionism with racism.

To urge fellow NGOs and UN member-states to rise above anti-Semitism at Geneva, the Magenta Foundation of Holland, the American Jewish Committee's Jacob Blaustein Institute for the Advancement of Human Rights and Human Rights First have circulated a petition with five "core principles" (www.magenta.nl/coreprinciples.html) that would reject any effort to "foment hateful stereotyping in the name of human rights" and instead "uphold language and behavior that unites rather than divides."

The New Israel Fund, a group that promotes human rights and pluralism in Israel, is one of 96 signatories pushing for a more productive conference. But NIF said it will not allocate funds for any of its grantees to attend the event. In 2001, the fund provided $50,000 for such participation through a Ford grant it had received.

There is no contradiction, said an NIF spokeswoman, nor does it indicate a lack of trust that its own grantees – some of whom were most active in Durban – would adhere to these higher standards.

"Basically, NIF was outraged at the misuse" of the Durban forum and was concerned about "a possible repetition" of the tone and substance, said the spokeswoman, Naomi Paiss.

UN stung by criticism

"We are a family of organizations representing a range of opinions," she said. "As strongly as we feel about Durban, this is not a question of forbidding another group from attending. We are saying we will not fund it."

One NIF and Ford grantee that played a prominent role in Durban – Adalah: The Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel – says it has yet to decide whether to attend.

"Adalah will deal with the follow-up issues regarding Durban at the relevant time, not now," Eva Mousa, the group's media director, told JTA. "At that time, Adalah will speak about it and discuss it with our donors, including Ford and NIF."

The United Nations, meanwhile, stung by criticism of the 2001 event, is taking steps to prevent a repetition.

In late May, member-states decided to host the event on the serene, secure UN campus in Geneva. In Durban, with thousands of activists milling about inside tents and on the streets, Jewish activists say the atmosphere often grew tense — even intimidating — punctured by anti-Semitic incidents.

The world body also is expected to eliminate a separate NGO Forum, which in Durban was the source of the harshest anti-Israel rhetoric. At the forum, the Jewish state was accused of such human rights crimes as genocide, apartheid and ethnic cleansing.

Startled by the protest walkout of the American and Israeli delegations – and the discredit it brought upon the conference itself – the member-states who remained settled on two rather benign references to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in the government declaration.

At this point, it's "very likely" that NGO participation in Geneva will be restricted and woven into the governmental gathering, said a UN official who asked not to be identified because there was no authorization to speak on the record.

Jewish observers taken aback by conference accreditation

NGOs instead will probably be encouraged to attend, but at most official UN meetings will have to request an opportunity to address the gathering beforehand. Each will be allotted three minutes to speak.

None of the 775 NGOs that attended Durban saw their accreditation revoked for their actions there, so they remain accredited and free to attend April's event, according to the UN official.

"The NGO issue is a highly political issue here," the official said.

This format may mean less Israel-bashing, but also less criticism of UN member-states that rank at the bottom of most global surveys of racism and other forms of discrimination. After all, few governments choose to freely chastise themselves.

Still, three minutes available every day at a four- or five-day conference – the world's largest in the sphere of human rights – is enough time to sling arrows, hammer home a message to the media and have it documented for eternity in UN archives.

That's why some Jewish observers were taken aback by the conference accreditation granted to the Anti-Apartheid Wall Campaign.

The group, according to its Web site, was formed one year after Durban, in October 2002, by one of the more extremist NGOs that did attend Durban -- the Palestinian Environmental NGOs Network.

The Wall Campaign partnered with another prominent Israel basher at Durban, the Palestinian NGO Network, or PNGO, to hold the First Palestinian Conference for the Boycott of Israel (BDS) on Nov. 18, 2007. At the time of Durban, PNGO was a Ford grantee, but is no longer.

In addition, the Wall Campaign and PNGO are two members of the National Committee to Commemorate the Nakba, the Arab term for catastrophe used to depict Israel's creation as a state.

On its Web site, the Wall Campaign links to BADIL, the group based in Bethlehem, on the West Bank, which declared its intent in Brazil last month to bang the apartheid drum against Israel in Geneva.

This link refers to BADIL's role in leading the current "Nakba 60 campaign," an international effort aimed at countering Israel at 60 celebrations.

At the April planning conference for the Durban follow-up, the Wall Campaign won accreditation without debate. More public attention in Geneva was devoted to Iran's intervention to deny a Canadian Jewish group accreditation to attend the event next year. The group, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, (CIJA) citing bureaucratic and political hurdles, eventually withdrew its application.

'Whole process' discriminatory to CIJA

"The whole process had become so discriminatory to us, we felt that no matter how many times we answered their questions and responded to shorter and shorter deadlines we were asked the same questions over and over again," Hershell Ezrin, chief executive officer of CIJA, said at the time.

Meanwhile, BADIL's home page in July announced a new Web site, "It Is Apartheid," with a "viral, guerrilla marketing" campaign that includes tips on how to propagandize neighbors, co-workers and strangers.

The group's presence in Brasilia and its lobbying of Latin American delegations was another harbinger for Jewish observers who warn the Geneva event may follow in the politicized footsteps of Durban.

The Geneva-based UN Watch declared that the current working paper, in UN lingo known as a "non-paper," already "breaches red lines" as laid out by the Europeans: It singles out the Palestinians for sympathy, implicitly criticizing Israel.

The Simon Wiesenthal Center, which sent two observers to Brasilia, described the event as a "lost opportunity" to underscore those red lines.

Latin Americans "have failed to stand up and be counted," Shimon Samuels, Wiesenthal's director for international relations, told JTA.

Meanwhile, with the Ford Foundation announcing that it won't pay to send any grantee to the Geneva conference – both because of its prospects for failure and potential to become another anti-Israel festival – and with other donors, governmental and nongovernmental, reportedly wavering, Samuels says that some have found a target to blame in case the Durban follow-up disintegrates.

Samuels said that in Brasilia, he discussed how to prevent a pro-Palestinian "hijacking of the agenda" with an Afro-American group lobbying for slavery compensation.

The fellow activist agreed, he said, but "blew my mind with a vehement accusation of Jewish control of the Durban boycott movement" and "attacked me for stopping foundation funding of their participation in Geneva and destroying possibilities for a NGO Forum."

Dry Bones QUIZ SHOW

Linking Israel to South Africa

JTA

Linking Israel to the former apartheid state of South Africa can be traced back to the late 1960s, when the Soviet anti-Zionist campaign found common cause with Arab world grievances at the United Nations.

Diplomatic pressure on Israel culminated in 1975 when the UN General Assembly passed the notorious "Zionism is racism" resolution. At the same time, the United Nations and other world bodies denounced apartheid as a "crime."

Israel was soon linked with South Africa and its apartheid system of racial segregation, in which a racial minority ruled over a racial majority within one state.

In one instance, in 1977, the General Assembly, heavily influenced by its large Arab and Muslim bloc, passed a resolution that singled out Israeli "collaboration" with apartheid South Africa, though South Africa at that time maintained relations with dozens of other countries. The implication was clear.

"Zionism is racism" remained on the UN books until the Cold War ended; the resolution was rescinded in 1991. Former UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan later described the era as a "low point" in UN history.

Although "Zionism is racism" became passe, Israel's foes would revive essentially the same equation shortly after the second Palestinian uprising, or intifadah, erupted in September 2000. They rebranded it, however, as "Israel is apartheid."

Certain pro-Palestinian advocates found that by eliding the context of terrorism, they could portray the severe restrictions on Palestinian movement that Israel said were necessary to counter suicide bombings, as racist, comparable to a once-despised white regime.

The ideal platform for this charge was in the symbolic heart of apartheid, South Africa, at the 2001 Durban World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance.

Thus the "Durban strategy" was born: to paint Israel as a "racist, apartheid" state and to isolate the Jewish nation through boycotts, divestment and sanctions.

Israeli device helps paraplegics stand tall

By RACHEL NEIMAN
ISRAEL21c

Say the word "exoskeleton" and most people think of actress Sigourney Weaver in the movie Aliens. As Ellen Ripley, she brandishes cargo-loading pistons for arms and legs to duke it out with the mother alien. After that, just walking may seem a mundane use for exoskeletons, but the action is more powerful than any science fiction story when paraplegics can use this motorized equipment to conduct daily life as their mobile counterparts do.

ReWalk is an Israeli-developed quasi-robotic ambulation system developed by ARGO Medical Technologies that provides a viable, upright, day-to-day alternative for wheelchair users. The wearable upright mobility system was specially designed for individuals with lower-limb disabilities. By restoring upright mobility, the developers say, ReWalk delivers benefits on the health, economic, and societal levels.

"What we want to do is have the person wake up in the morning, put on clothes, put on the ReWalk, go to work and go throughout the day wearing it," Dr. Amit Goffer PhD, founder and director of Argo, and ReWalk's developer, tells ISRAEL21c.

Uri Attir, CEO of Argo, adds that users "regain their dignity" by being able to stand eye-to-eye with colleagues. "It may seem trivial, but it's not," says Goffer emphatically.

Goffer should know. Formerly an electrical engineer at RAFAEL and Elscint, he left in 1994 to found Odin Medical Technologies, the developer of a revolutionary inter-operative, real-time MRI.

Odin was acquired by Medtronic for $30 million (all figures in US dollars) in 2006 but by then, Goffer was out of the picture, the victim of an accident that left him a quadriplegic. Following intense rehabilitation, Goffer got to work, developing the ReWalk prototype in his home, funding it both privately and with a Tnufa - Startup Promotion Program grant.

The prototype was past the proof-of-concept stage when Goffer entered the Technion Incubator, TechnionSeed.

ReWalk comprises a light wearable brace support suit which integrates DC motors at the joint, rechargeable batteries, an array of sensors and a computer-based control system. It fits the body snugly to detect upper body movements, which are used to initiate and maintain the walking process. Wearers also use crutches for stability and safety. "The main issue was triggering and maintaining gait. We tried it on three paraplegics the first time and the results gave me the confidence that it worked," recalls Goffer.

Argo spent two years under the auspices of TechnionSeed, and currently operates out of Haifa's MATAM high-tech industrial park. The original investors include two out of the three incubator owners, venture capital funds Vitalife and ProSeed, along with the Technion Research & Development Foundation (TRDF), TechnionSeed and the Office of the Chief Scientist of the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor.

The company's current round of funding started in January 2008. So far, $1 million, an investment from the Marc Rich Foundation, has been raised out of a targeted

$5 million. "That money will cover our operating needs for the next one and a half years," says Attir. "By that time, [late 2009 or early 2010] we intend to be selling commercially."

The target market, according to Goffer and Attir, will be the Western world's wheelchair-user community, of whom 300,000 are spinal cord injury sufferers who are physically able to use crutches as a stabilizing tool.

Attir estimates the initial market at $6 billion per year, worldwide. "That's a very conservative estimate, because it doesn't take into account other forms of wheelchair bound persons such as victims of stroke, multiple sclerosis, and certain forms of cerebral palsy [estimated at 2.8 million in the United States]," he says. "I can't name an exact price but I can say that a very good motorized wheelchair costs between $15,000 and $25,000 and an iBot [a sophisticated wheelchair designed by Dean "Segway" Kamen] costs $35,000 and we'll be well below that."

ReWalk also reduces expenses for taxpayers, the company says. On average, a paraplegic costs HMOs in the US over $270,000 during the first year of hospitalization and almost $28,000 in each subsequent year, including re-hospitalization and treatment for conditions such as pressure sores and recurrent urinary tract and other infections.

The standing position afforded by the ReWalk, says Attir, significantly reduces many of these problems and also serves as physiotherapy. "It would also render obsolete the need to periodically go to a rehab centre and use the automated treadmills, which cost 300,000 euros [$428,000 US] each. It will replace the need to install stair climbers in the home as well," he says.

ReWalk is undergoing clinical trials in Israel at the Rehabilitation Hospital at Chaim Sheba Medical Center - Tel Hashomer, with pilot projects planned for rehab centres in Holland and Italy. A US trial is scheduled to begin in November at the Moss Rehabilitation Center in Philadelphia, after which Argo will apply for FDA regulatory approval.

Argo's demo video features team member Radi Kioff, a 40-year-old Druze Israeli who was shot in the back while serving in the Israel Defense Forces during the First Lebanon War. Ironically, the man who devised the system that allows Kioff to walk cannot benefit from his own invention. A quadriplegic, Amit Goffer has only partial use of his hands, but not enough to operate the ReWalk.

"This isn't the first company I've founded," says Goffer with equanimity. "My incentive to develop it was a business opportunity. When I was injured the first thing I was offered was the only thing: a wheelchair. I do believe that in the future, in many cases, the ReWalk - or its competition - might be offered. I don't see any reason for the wheelchair to be the sole solution. There hasn't been a real change [in the technology] for centuries. So, we're taking a safe business approach, starting with paraplegics, and the time for a quadriplegic like me will come."

CEO Uri Attir himself has a hook prosthesis as the result of a war injury that took his hand when he was serving in the Israel Defense Forces. "Amit and I come into meetings with prosthetics manufacturers who are strategic partners, and people ask 'Are you buyers or sellers?'

"And we answer: 'Although we seem like customers, we're here to sell you products.'"

Helping African scientists to heal their own

By JUDITH SUDILOVSKY
Israel 21c

Ben-Gurion University of the Negev
NIBN
The National Institute for Biotechnology in the Negev

Two Israeli scientists from Ben Gurion University of the Negev are out to change the way the scientific Western world deals with Africa.

One of the biggest hurdles Africa faces is overcoming numerous infectious diseases, note BGU colleagues Dr. Leslie Lobel, 52, of the Department of Virology, and Professor Robert Marks, 47, of the Department of Biotechnology engineering.

Until now, most diagnostic kits, vaccines and drugs used to test for and counter viral diseases have been purchased and sent to African countries from Western countries. But in most cases they are too expensive for the budgets of African countries and so only a limited number of people are diagnosed. Some vaccines against viral disease do not include the local African strains and treatments are either too costly or not formulated to function under African reality which includes lack of refrigeration and clean water.

In addition, the emphasis has been on diseases of concern and interest to the Western world such as HIV, the virus which causes AIDS, and malaria - which do not necessarily correlate with the diseases which the Africans themselves are most concerned about, according to American-Israeli Lobel who immigrated six years ago, giving up a position at the Columbia University School of Medicine to set up his own lab in the virology department at BGU.

Robert Marks

In general, Africans take a pragmatic approach to infectious diseases and are more worried about diseases which affect their livestock and limit their food production and more directly affect the vitality and productivity of their citizens, he said.

The problem is rooted in a colonial mentality which sees the issues of Africa through the eyes of the developed world. In part that happens, says Lobel, because very few westerners actually spend time in Africa and even fewer ask Africans what they themselves need and want.

By working hand-in-hand with African scientists, Lobel and Marks hope to create a world-class consortium based in Africa, which will transfer existing technology and develop new technologies for treatment and diagnosis of infectious diseases prioritized by the African scientists themselves.

Leslie Lobel

The new BGU initiative - the Bio-Africa Research Network (BARN) - was launched at the ViralCheck workshop and conference held in Dakar, Senegal in June. It is meant to turn the traditional pattern around and get the African scientists involved in determining what are the medical and scientific needs for each community.

With world-renowned virologist Dr. Robert Webster of St. Jude Children's Research Hospital of Memphis, Tenn., in attendance, the conference was an auspicious start for the network.

A book which will be published by BARN following the conference will detail all aspects of viral diseases. Contributors include scientists from the United States, Europe, Israel and Africa thereby providing a global perspective on various aspects of viral disease and diagnostics.

"This allows me to do amazing science while at the same time doing something great for humanity. This is the most important thing in my life right now. It is very exciting," says Lobel.

BARN is to include a core nucleus of scientists in both English- and French-speaking African countries including Senegal, Uganda, Ethiopia, Cameroon, Kenya and South Africa who will work together, to do research and exchange information among the research teams. So far, teams in Senegal, Ethiopia, Uganda and South Africa are actively involved in research for BARN, with scientists from the other countries due to join this year.

"There are a lot of smart African scientists who much of the rest of the world don't appreciate," says Lobel. They intend to seek these people out to become part of their network, he added. "We want to select people who are ready to accomplish things and want to work under this philosophy. We are not planning to simply send money to Africa. We want to send people and technical know-how to help the Africans help themselves."

Already, notes Marks, an Israeli-American raised in France who immigrated to Israel in 1995, they have met a number of impressive scientists from Ghana at the Dakar conference and are hoping to recruit them for the BARN network in Ghana.

'It won't be easy'

Under the BARN initiative there will be one lab in each country that will include personnel from governmental institutions, universities, research institutions and hospitals. Research will focus on detection of viruses, treatment and the reduction of bio-environmental threats.

In addition to building on the good relations Israel has with Muslim Senegal and other African countries, as dual American citizens he and Marks are also able to build some goodwill for the United States in Africa, says Lobel, and the US State Department provided partial funding for the conference in Dakar with this in mind.

'Israelis do well in Africa'

He adds that while working in Africa he has had to put aside his American way of thinking and rely more on his newly acquired Israeli mentality.

"Israelis do well in Africa. They know how to help Africans help themselves. Americans and Europeans don't understand the African mentality," he explains.

Seed money for the project has been raised through a private American foundation and will allow Lobel, Marks and their students to travel to Africa on a rotating basis to work with scientists there, as well as bring over African scientists for training at BGU labs. Funding will also enable African BARN scientists to visit each others' labs for collaboration and to share data for multi-national research projects.

"It won't be easy, but we have enough experience on the ground which enables us to make the least number of mistakes," says Lobel.

The main goals of the initiative are threefold: to develop new technologies for diagnostics of infectious diseases in keeping with the African reality; to develop African intellectual property; and to establish start-ups of medical companies.

"The problem is they get everything from the US and Europe. Africans can make their own vaccines (which would be less expensive and more suited to African viral strains), but nobody is helping them do that because the companies want to sell them their vaccines," says Lobel. "We want to change the whole philosophy."

'The whole idea is to help African scientists write patents and apply for grant money'

The challenge, say the Israelis, is not just setting up the network but establishing it in such a way that it is sustainable in the long term, creates jobs, and succeeds in showing Africans how to help themselves.

"The whole idea is not just to publish, which obviously Leslie and I need to do, but to help African scientists write patents and apply for grant money," says Marks. Once scientists begin receiving their own grant money they will eventually be weaned from BARN resources, he explains.

It is hoped the network will provide jobs in BARN laboratories in each country, as well as in the start-up companies which will be established to produce various diagnostic kits, drugs and vaccines resulting from the research.

Lobel and Marks hope to be able to raise money for the first five year phase of the initiative by which time they will be able to set up start-up companies.

"After they complete their scientific studies African students don't really get (scientific) jobs. There is no chance to benefit from their education. The moment we create the first corporation people will understand the benefit of such a network," Marks said.

The initiative will be deemed a success, adds Marks, when those who initiated it can leave the network in the capable hands of a strong team of African scientists who keep the project moving forward.

An Israeli fights to eradicate neglected diseases in Ethiopia

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Israel 21c

While researching tropical diseases, Prof. Zvi Bentwich, an Israeli medical doctor, noticed an unusual correlation between the health of AIDS and tuberculosis patients, and those who had intestinal worms.

Prof. Zvi Bentwich

Not prevalent in Western countries, intestinal worms (helminth infections) are causing an alarming number of health problems in developing nations, and Prof. Bentwich, from Ben Gurion University of the Negev, is planning to change that.

Up to 50 percent of the entire African population suffers from the condition, and negative health effects include retardation of growth, anemia, poor cognitive functioning and liver disease. In Ethiopia, infection rates fluctuate from 30-50 percent, depending on whether a community is close to water-rich areas, such as rivers, lakes, and swamps, he said.

"I personally became interested and involved with the intestinal worms issue due to my exposure to this problem through the Ethiopian immigrants [in Israel]," says Prof. Bentwich, who heads the Center for Emerging Tropical Diseases and AIDS at Ben Gurion University.

"As head of the largest AIDS center, I dealt with a large number of Ethiopian HIV and AIDS patients, and through them became aware of the magnitude of this problem in Ethiopia," he says.

Prof. Bentwich hypothesizes that intestinal worms affect the immune system so profoundly that it has a major impact on patients' susceptibility to HIV and tuberculosis. The worms also affect how patients cope with the diseases.

Besides his and the center's professional contribution, Israel does not have a unique or special involvement with intestinal worms. They became extinct with the establishment of the State in 1948.

As part of his mission, Prof. Bentwich plans to eradicate intestinal worms in Ethiopia. The doctor, who has been featured by the BBC for his work with Doctors Without Borders, says the first stage of the operation will start this August and aims to deworm about 30,000 Ethiopians in three separate locations. After that, he plans to help a population of 250,000 people living in the town of Mekele, in northern Ethiopia, during the fall.

The program combines the provision and administration of antihelminthic medications, a few pills every four to six months, with an education program on how to improve hygiene and protect populations from exposure to the parasites.

According to Ben Gurion University, such activities are part of a worldwide struggle to eliminate Neglected Tropical Diseases (NTD). The project is being funded by an international coalition of non-profit organizations.

"NTDs are one of the most evident hallmark signs of poverty and neglect, significantly contributing to the persistence of this situation in a very large number of countries in Africa, Asia and South America," says Prof. Bentwich. "Though responsible for serious morbidity, and affecting general growth and mental abilities, they have been largely neglected by the Western developed countries, since they are practically nonexistent there."

Prof. Bentwich is leading the Ben Gurion University initiative as an international partner in the fight against NTDs across Africa. "It is now the time for Israel, which is among the most developed and rich nations, to help the poor and the neglected," he said, while welcoming interested parties from around the world to join in the fight.

Making Headway in migraine pain relief

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Israel 21c

Many sufferers from chronic neck pain and migraines don't know why the pain persists, but they do know that a gentle massage of the neck muscles can make life more bearable. That's just what the new Israeli company Headway is planning to do.

Headway's Occiflex device offers relief for people suffering from chronic headaches.

The company, which is located within the Misgav Venture Accelerator Incubator, has developed a device called the Occiflex to give gentle massage therapy to the neck muscles of people with chronic neck and head pain. Using biofeedback methods, the device can be an add-on to a physical therapist's treatment table and could improve the quality of life for the 30 million Americans who suffer from migraine headaches.

Currently people combat migraines with powerful drugs and invasive procedures or opt for alternative treatments such as acupuncture. But Headway's Occiflex mimics the pain-relieving hands-on therapy given by physicians and physical therapists.

Occiflex is equipped with a special head-cradling device controlled by a computer. The patient lies down on the table and the Occiflex cradle moves the head gently along a predefined 3-D course – a line of movement which varies from patient to patient and which has been optimized to relieve tension in the muscles.

Stopping the vicious cycle in headaches

"Migraines are treated with powerful drugs," says Steve Rhodes, CEO of the Misgav incubator.

The Occiflex, he explains, tackles the "vicious cycle" of muscle contraction in the neck. "This relaxes muscles and reduces pain."

The movements the Occiflex makes are similar to those performed by practitioners, but with some very important advantages says the company: the device can restore normal muscle activation patterns by using biofeedback (real-time patient data) to optimize treatment.

Flexible and mobile, the device can be used in pain clinics and can be brought to remote locations. Eventually, the company plans on developing a home model.

Relieves a spectrum of head and neck pain

Chronic headaches such as migraines, tension-type headaches, myofascial and post-traumatic headaches are some of the headaches that can be alleviated with Occiflex. It is also believed to be effective for treating whiplash and post-spinal surgery pain.

The company plans on targeting the professional market, and in the United States, it will be sold through distributors, with a range of disposable products to accompany it.

Headway was founded in 2006, and the Occiflex prototype has been tested on healthy volunteers. The company is led by CEO Tamir Levital, a biotech researcher; and was founded by Dr. Yaron River, a neurologist who heads the Pain Treatment Center at the Bnei-Zion Medical Center in Haifa.

The Occiflex is about to enter clinical trials and could be on the American market within 18 months if the right investor is found. Rhodes adds that the device also opens a revenue stream for pain clinics by automating what was normally a hands-on and labour-intensive treatment.

Laying the groundwork for new bacteria-resistant antibiotics

By JUDITH SUDILOVSKY
Israel 21c

From trying to see if she could touch her tongue to the tip of her nose as a young child huddled in a Jerusalem bomb shelter during Israel's War of Independence, to accidentally starting a fire while trying to see whether water moves faster than kerosene, award-winning Israeli scientist Ada Yonath has always been fascinated with how things work.

Ada Yonath

"All my life there were experiments. It was just plain curiosity. Once I broke my arm when I fell into the garden trying to measure the height of our balcony," says Yonath, 69, a molecular biologist at the Weizmann Institute of Science who recently became the first Israeli to receive the $100,000 Life's Work Prize for women in science from L'Oreal and UNESCO.

Yonath, a professor of structural biology and the director of the Helen and Milton A. Kimmelman Center for Biomolecular Structure and Assembly at the Weizmann Institute, won the award for her 25 years of research into the ribosome protein-synthesizing system and the mode of action of antibiotics.

Widely considered the pioneer of ribosome crystallography, Yonath has revealed the modes of action of more than 20 different antibiotics that target bacterial ribosomes.

Through this groundbreaking work, she has been able to identify how bacteria become resistant to antibiotics, a problem that is worrying the medical establishment and governments worldwide as the spread of super bugs like MRSA continues unabated.

Yonath's research lays the groundwork for scientists to develop new bacteria-resistant antibiotics that better target the ribosomes of pathogens to avoid the problem of resistance.

Yonath's natural curiosity has been indulged since her youth, she says. Though her parents had little opportunity for education themselves, they were supportive and insightful enough to assure that their unconventional daughter was given a good academic education - even if it meant taking two buses to get her to a school in another Jerusalem neighborhood.

Encouragement from teachers was key to success

"I never thought about me being a woman or not when I did science - I was just a human being born into an extremely poor family," says Yonath, whose family moved to Tel Aviv after her father died. "We were so poor we didn't even have books."

But one book she did manage to get her hands on and read was the story of Madame Marie Curie, the pioneer in the field of radioactivity, who was awarded two Nobel prizes in two different scientific fields. The story of the Polish-French scientist sparked a desire in her to do more science.

Another key to her success was the backing and encouragement she received from some of her teachers. Her elementary school math teacher Zvi Vinitzky introduced her to Tony Halle, the principal of the elite Tichon Hahadash in Tel Aviv. Taken by the young girl's abilities, Halle admitted her to the school although she was not able to pay the tuition. In return, Yonath tutored young Bulgarian immigrants in math.

In the past, Yonath says, the common wisdom has been that women are not good at math or science, and that their roles as mothers precludes them from being good scientists because of the time and dedication the profession requires.

"Women make up half the population," she says. "I think the population is losing half of the human brain power by not encouraging woman to go into the sciences. Woman can do great things if they are encouraged to do so."

She herself has held a number of postdoctoral positions at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Carnegie Mellon University, among others. She has also won several other prizes for her work including the Israel Prize, the Wolf Prize and Columbia University's Louis Gross Horwitz Prize; all while balancing her work and family life and raising her daughter.

"If a woman is happy with what she is doing at home and at work then everybody is happy," Yonath says.

Today, plans to retire are still a long way away, and she works hard to encourage young women to enter scientific fields by welcoming organized groups into her lab to give them a closer look at the scientific life.

"I want them to decide for themselves if they want to study science," she says. "I would like women to have the opportunity to do what is interesting to them, to go after their curiosity. And I would like the world to be open to that. I know in many places there is opposition to that."

A Green Globe to protect Israel's national treasures

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Israel 21c

Americans love awards nights -- with remote control in hand, it's hard to leave the couch when the Academy Awards or the Golden Globes are on. Israel, too, has its own awards nights, and one growing in popularity. Its spirit isn't golden and Hollywood glam, however, but simple and green.

Awarded annually, Israel's Green Globe is an award given to outstanding leaders and organizations working in Israel's non-profit environment sector. This year, the award in the "local organization" category was awarded to Shomera, a faith-based NGO that encourages religious Jews to access the wisdom in the Torah to solve environmental problems.

Inspired by the biblical passage "to work and protect" (Genesis 2:15) the organization imbues Jerusalem's communities with an appreciation for the capital and its national treasures, while giving people the tools to protect those treasures.

The faith-based approach fits Jerusalem, home to a dizzying number of religious worshippers of multiple faiths. The company's work resonated with the panel of Green Globe judges. Naor Yerushalmi, an associate director at Life and Environment, an umbrella group of environmental NGOs, spoke with ISRAEL21c about the choice of Shomera.

"They are working inside a wide variety of communities: among the ultra-orthodox, special needs and youth," he said. "Their programs are ground-breaking, because most of the environmental work [in Israel] is not taking place in these communities."

Yerushalmi is a senior adviser on public relations and public affairs, and has served as spokesperson for the Ministry of the Environment and as director of public affairs at the Embassy of Israel in Washington, DC.

"Traditional Jewish texts," writes Shomera's website, "are replete with environmental source material. The Torah and rabbinic literature discuss the problems and solutions to many modern day environmental concerns both on a philosophical level and in the legal realm."

According to Yerushalmi, "They are leading the way in breaking the environmental word to these communities." He noted that the Green Globe is often presented with a twist: Shomera received its prize this year from the hands of Abed Namarna, an Arab-Israeli working in the green arena to educate the Arab community through the Hatikva Al Amal Association for the Advancement of Culture.

Like the Academy Awards, Israel's Green Globe is televised and is prominently featured in the country's media. Awarded on World Environment Day, and founded five years ago by Israel's Green Environment Fund and Shatil, the Green Globe has gone in previous years to Citizens for the Environment in the Galilee, an Arab and Jewish grassroots group working to fight water insecurity, and to the Organization for the Quality of Life in Nahariya, which works to eliminate dangerous stores of asbestos around the city and region.

A Green Globe is much coveted by local green organizations in Israel, but beware polluters: there is an award for you too, that you don't want to get – the dreaded Black Globe!

Israeli Muslims set to green the Arab world

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Israel 21c

North Americans have been aware of environmental issues for decades. Influential activists like Rachel Carson, who wrote Silent Spring, exposed the dangers of pesticides and pollution in the early 1960s.

Israel has benefited from America's early start and taken some issues a step further. While "green" is now seeping into Israeli society, from groundbreaking R&D developments in clean technology to local educational programs on recycling, the Israeli Arab community lags behind. But thanks to a new initiative, that is about to change.

Green activist, Mohammad Rabah Aghbarieh, Northern Triangle unit director, hopes to help spread the environmental message.

In a groundbreaking event last month, 50 Israeli Arab imams (Muslim clerics) gathered in Umm el-Fahm, Israel, to listen and learn about local environmental issues. Israel's Ministry of Environmental Protection, an organizer of the conference, is hopeful that the material – including a CD, posters and stickers citing references to the environment in the Qur'an – and the message will spread beyond Israel to neighbouring Middle East nations, where environmental issues are seriously neglected.

"We would be happy if they [the imams] could spread the message to other Arab countries," said Sharon Achdut, spokesman for the Environmental Protection Ministry.

One issue the ministry wanted to address was the growing number of complaints about noise pollution, says Achdut. The mosques' daily calls to prayer are made over loudspeakers, which disturb some residents.

The ministry sent the message, says Achdut, that of course the mosques can continue their transmissions, but that they should take the noise level down a notch. The imams also got an opportunity to vent their concerns over the proximity of chicken coops in neighbouring Jewish communities, and the proximity of cellular phone antennas to their homes. Other issues discussed concerned construction waste, water pollution and sewage treatment.

"I think it was a success," says Achdut. "Just the fact that we could collect these imams together [to listen to the green message] made it a success."

Mohammad Rabah Aghbarieh, the Environmental Quality Unit's Northern Triangle director who is also a green activist and Israeli Arab, helped prepare material for every imam to take home.

Rabah Aghbarieh said that the event "as a concept" should be replicated and adopted by the rest of the Muslim world. He was proud to report that only one day after the conference the message was getting sent to Israeli Muslims on their holy day, Friday. "A day after the conference ended imams were already talking to people in their communities," he said.

Finding excellence in Israel's artists

By NICKY BLACKBURN
Israel 21c

Rachel Marani is the first to admit that she doesn't make life easy for artists. As the founder of the non-profit IcExcellence (the Israel Cultural Excellence Foundation) she says that the artists who join reap clear benefits, but, whether they are painters, musicians, dancers or fashion designers, they must hone not only their creative skills but also work on the business side of their affairs.

It's worth it, however. Since the organization was founded six years ago, many of the 38 artists involved have found fame and fortune, and none of the hand-picked few, who include writer Etgar Keret, photographer Adi Ness, choreographer and dancer Emanuel Gat, musician Shlomi Shaban, fashion designer Mirit Weinstock and conductor Gil Shohat, have any intention of dropping out.

Marani started IcExcellence, (pronounced 'I see excellence') to bring Israeli artists the recognition she felt they so richly deserved, but often seemed to be lacking.

She came up with the idea when she was working as the cultural attaché at the Israeli embassy in Washington, D.C. She was in charge of the 50th anniversary celebrations in Washington, organizing 365 events, one for every day of the year, at locations like the Kennedy Center, the Library of Congress and the Smithsonian.

"We brought hundreds of artists from Israel to Washington and it gave me an opportunity to see how unique they were," she said. "People kept asking me how it was possible they didn't know about them in regular times. Israeli artists are great, but so few of them are well known."

Marani returned to Israel and carried out an extensive survey of Israel's art scene to try to discover what was missing. She explored cultural improvement programs all over the world in an effort to understand what could help Israeli artists. She then began raising money from private individuals, institutions and foundations in Israel and abroad.

What makes IcExcellence so unusual in the realm of art and culture globally, is the inspiration it takes from the business world. Aside from programs designed to advance artistic achievements, the artists also take part in a business skills program to develop their professional careers.

'We are providing support programs'

There is business coaching, management training, language study, branding, and mentoring from leading business consultants. Some of the artists are sent to study abroad, others are taught to set up websites, or take part in international conventions.

"We want to allow them to expand their ability, and progress," says Marani. "Artists may be strong in the arts, but when it comes to running a business, it's definitely not their field. And some have to be real managers. A good dancer will become a choreographer, then he needs a dance ensemble, and all of a sudden he's a manager. It's the same for a pianist, or a violinist, who suddenly finds himself in charge of an orchestra."

"Eighty percent of their time is occupied with issues that are weaknesses, not strengths," she adds. "It's a pity."

IcExcellence's programs are all designed for the individual artist. "What a musician needs is different from what a painter needs," explains Marani, who is now the managing director of the foundation.

Marani stresses that it does not offer scholarships. "We are providing support programs that will benefit the artists for years to come, not on a day-to-day basis."

Nor does it accept applicants. Artistic advisory committees choose the best artistic talent from 11 fields. "You can't apply for this. Our board locates and chooses the best artistic talents," she explains. "It's a big process to get into the foundation. We look not only at the art, but also the leadership, motivation and ambition of the artists. We only want people who want to be the best."

Originally, when the foundation started, it aimed to create three-year programs. Once the first group finished, however, the artists appealed for more time. These artists have now been with IcExcellence for five years.

'Nothing but praise for IcExcellence'

The artists themselves have nothing but praise for IcExcellence. "I never imagined how significant the presence of IcExcellence would be in my life as a creating and performing artist and as a music director," says Yaron Gottfried, a conductor and composer. "The foundation's true greatness and success is its original, creative way of working, and its approach to the complex personality of each and every artist."

Gottfried, who has been with IcExcellence for four years, admits that he owes some of his most significant experiences to the foundation, including a month-long stay at the MacDowell Colony, the oldest artists' colony in the United States, where he wrote a new composition, and participating in an international convention for symphony conductors in Boston.

"The foundation doesn't pamper you; quite the opposite," says Adi Ness, who is now winning worldwide acclaim for his photographs. "It forces you to make a lot of effort early on, to draft your request, to explain to yourself and the foundation what's important to your career."

"Today, the artists clearly understand our vision," says Marani. "They know they have to get out of the studio and make something happen. There's been a clear change in Israel following our activities."

The organization is now expanding its work in Israel and abroad, and aims to begin offering educational seminars for Israeli artists in Israel, Berlin and New York. "We realize we have amassed an astounding body of knowledge in the field of empowering artists. We want to share this knowledge and give artists some extra tools to fulfill their greatness and potential," says Marani.

In the meantime, the foundation is also creating a great deal of interest worldwide amongst organizations interested in trying to replicate IcExcellence's success.

For Marani, however, IcExcellence is more than just about art, or even a desire to help Israeli artists reach their potential. "The aim is to make people clearly identify between cultural excellence and Israel," she says. "Just as people go to London or Broadway to see great theater, so I hope they will come to Israel to see great art and culture. Art and culture can reach so many people beyond words. It's Israel's hidden asset."

The impact is already being felt, she says. "We are beginning to win first prizes in festivals all over the world, in film, dance and music. I think in five to 10 years from now, there will be a big revolution. The artists want it. They know how difficult it's going to be, but they want to do it, and this is a huge transformation."

Please don't hate me

By JOSH SCHEINERT

There were six of us in the Palestinian taxi – me, the Canadian, three Americans, our Palestinian guide George and a driver. We were stopped at a checkpoint somewhere in the West Bank on the way to Nablus. A young Israeli soldier approached the window. When we, the foreigners, handed him our passports he smiled at us, his eyes acknowledged our discomfort and unease. "Please don't hate me," he said.

I went to the West Bank because I had to. As a believer in and supporter of the State of Israel, I needed to see and experience for myself what happens on the other side of Israel's security barrier.

What I saw bothers me. But please let me finish before interrupting and talking about security. I know about security threats, that terrorism is real. I sat with an entire nation the other week to mourn Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev. At night, I pray for Gilad Schalit. In Jerusalem I often find myself walking past the Sbarro pizzeria restaurant, rebuilt after a horrific, cold-blooded suicide attack in 2001. And everyday, I ride the bus.

But I am still bothered by what I saw.

We entered Palestinian Authority-controlled territory in Bethlehem, criss-crossing a maze of concrete and barbed wire at a section of Israel's security barrier.

All I knew about the security barrier was what I had read, that it keeps terrorist out of Israel. I had also looked at pictures of it. But when you see it for real, up close, and on the other side, it ceases to be about terrorism. You become a prisoner. Its walls intimidate and impose upon your physical and mental liberty. Its walls tower over you, keeping you in, or out. It is filled with graffiti. One of its graffiti panels sticks out in my mind. "Is this your dream?" it asked.

Israel has a right to exist as a Jewish state and respond responsibly and proportionately to threats against its existence. To me, it is also a democratic state with a moral foundation. For those who share those beliefs with me, we need to keep asking ourselves what is our dream. That might force us to confront uncomfortable truths and grapple with difficult realities. However, it would be a bigger betrayal to our convictions if we did not.

I had heard about checkpoints. During our day we encountered about seven. In my mind a checkpoint was an inconvenience, a minor delay in a Palestinian's day. Against the backdrop of security they sounded ok.

Now the checkpoints bother me. They bring out the worst in us. And until you see it, from the Palestinian side, you cannot understand why. First, there are the delays. At one, we waited half an hour, stopped in the middle of nowhere. At another our driver cut to the front. We still waited for twenty minutes. If he had stayed at the back it would easily have been two hours. It is a good thing nothing we did that day was at a fixed time.

Yet, it is when your green-plated vehicle approaches the actual checkpoint when you really understand them. First, there is the soldier who affixes your vehicle in the scope of his sniper rifle, from down the road, or the guard tower above. Then, there are the two soldiers waiting for you, fingers on the trigger.

You cannot really understand how scary it is to watch a fully armed soldier, barking orders, threateningly point an automatic rifle at another human being. It happened as we were waiting in line to leave Nablus. There was a family travelling to a wedding and running very late behind us and someone got out of the car to ask the soldier if they could get to the front. The man soon got back into his car. After about five minutes, the soldier waved him up to the front. They passed through shortly thereafter.

A conversation we need to have

We approached our last checkpoint in the dead of night. As one soldier opened the taxi door, flipping through our passports, another stood on the other side, hand on the trigger. He had a face I will not forget. He was young, his cheeks still rosy. His eyes were scared; I could see he did not want to be there.

My purpose in writing this is not to advocate taking down the security barrier or dismantling any or all of the 550 checkpoints across the West Bank. Instead, I choose to share my experience because I feel, as a supporter of Israel, that I must. There is a conversation we need to have.

The Israel I saw that day is not the Israel whose flag and declaration of independence hang in my Toronto bedroom. Nor was it the Israel of my family, warm-hearted Israelis who will open their house to anyone and who believe their country has a right to security, but that human rights belong to everyone.

I tried to talk about that Israel to our Palestinian guide George, born in 1971. It fell on deaf ears. "What good does that do for me," he asked. "My Israel is soldiers and settlers, I live under occupation."

There are no easy answers. I certainly have none. In Nablus, the largest city in the West Bank, and one of the more sympathetic to violent extremism, I saw the Palestine that justifies checkpoints and barriers. Posters glorifying violent resistance and martyrs are everywhere. I did not get the impression the city could be reasoned with.

And then there is George, our tour guide. His rights organization is staunchly opposed to all forms of violent resistance, yet it refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state. For him, Zionism is a colonial enterprise committed to power and control. I refuse to believe that. However, at times, when travelling the West Bank it can be difficult to refute.

Yes, I know – security, 'they' made us do it. But after you spend a day like I did, you too will refuse to believe that everything I saw and experienced can be justified in the name of security.

My grandfather was a captain in the Haganah. There is a picture of him and his unit on my bookshelf. He died before Oslo died, and as such, never saw what has emerged in its wake. And so I wonder, because I truly do not know, what my grandfather would say as he stood in Bethlehem staring at the security barrier, being asked, "Is this your dream?"

However, the one thing I can say for certain is that he, who fought so that Israel could be free, did not fight for a country whose soldiers would one day have to begin their conversations by asking, "please don't hate me."

Josh Scheinert spent the summer in Jerusalem. He is a student at Osgoode Hall Law School in Toronto. His trip through the West Bank took him to Bethlehem, a nearby refugee camp and Nablus.

Young Jewish Zionists on an atypical journey

By NAOMI LIGHTMAN

"Naomi, I need to show you something," said a tall, anxious-looking participant on my Birthright trip, seconds before we filed onto the plane to Israel. A member of the US Air Force, the 22-year-old rolled up his shirt sleeve to display a massive black cross, tattooed upon his considerable bicep. "Don't worry, it's no problem," I assured him, smiling inwardly at what the ultra-Orthodox men seated next to us might think.

Birthright is a free, 10-day visit to Israel for Jews aged 18-26 who have not been there before on an organized tour. It is an attempt to promote Jewish identity among Diaspora youth. For this group from across the United States, I was the Canadian counsellor accompanying them.

As Ben exemplified, who exactly is Jewish is a matter of considerable ambiguity. His tattoo was my first indication that this Birthright trip was going to be a very different experience than most. This would be no typical journey of young Jewish Zionists visiting their religious and cultural 'homeland'.

Entitled Peace, Pluralism and Social Justice, this particular journey was an attempt to encourage those who would normally be uncomfortable with the traditional Birthright trips, a group that wanted to see the country through a more political, and nuanced lens.

Participants included lawyers from Austin, sports marketers from Denver, and students from Brooklyn. Many had never been to a Friday night service and none could speak a complete sentence in Hebrew. This was an incredibly disparate group of people, most of them fiercely opinionated. Among them were dedicated anarchists, Jews with strongly anti-Zionist viewpoints, and many who just declared themselves "sick and tired of hearing the same staunchly pro-Israel perspective" from the organized Jewish community.

Vying to reconcile the participants' competing demands with the more mainstream expectations of Birthright's funders was quite a challenge.

I will never forget standing in an 'unrecognized' Bedouin village in the Negev desert, watching participants play soccer with the local children in the dusty fields near a highway. We had just heard the head of the village give his account of his community's permanent threat of house demolition and prosecution for their 'illegal' use of state land. Despite the Israeli government's denial of running water and electricity for his family, he told us "I still consider myself a Zionist."

A few days later, we visited the Muslim-Arab town of Barta'a, which was split by the 1949 Armistice Line. The residents, members of the same extended Kabha family, now live on opposite sides of the 1967 Green Line. Standing on the rooftop of a rug shop on the Israeli-Arab side of the village, it was clear that where we stood was significantly more prosperous than on the Palestinian side of town, located in the West Bank. "How is that a border?" asked a participant from Chicago, staring at the garbage-filled ditch.

Reality on ground always complicated

In Tel Aviv, we traveled to a refugee shelter where men from Darfur explained to us in broken English about their tragic journey from war-torn Africa to Israel and the dangers they experienced along the way. They spoke to our guide in perfect Hebrew, telling us of their experiences working in Jewish communities, finally free, and earning a living in local shops and hotels.

To hear a different perspective, we spoke with a Jewish settler who had been forced out of Gaza during the 2005 disengagement. She showed us photographs of the beautiful flowers that had grown in her gardens and detailed her daughter's misery at being expelled from her childhood home. "We had a right to be there," she told us, eyes flashing, her anger almost tangible.

Some soldiers from the Israeli Army joined our group, in a form of cultural exchange. One of the Israeli soldiers explained that a member of her family had died in a recent suicide bombing. She was openly critical of our lack of understanding and told us we had "idealistic and unrealistic" views on Israeli-Palestinian coexistence. While upsetting to many in our group, her views are typical of many Israelis, and it was important that the participants had a chance to chat with her.

For me, these poignant political encounters were some of the most memorable experiences of the trip. But it was also surprisingly powerful to visit the traditional Jewish sites on our tour.

Having lived in Israel numerous times, I guess I'd become somewhat jaded about places such as Masada and the Holocaust Memorial Museum. Yet seeing the participants' eyes fill with wonder as we walked along the narrow cobblestoned streets of the Old City of Jerusalem was almost magical. One 26- year-old woman was moved to tears at the Western Wall. With the golden Dome of the Rock in the distance, and religious Jews praying fervently all around, I could see why she was so overcome. How special that I could be these people's introduction to places so intimately connected with Judaism's past and present!

As a 'Progressive Zionist', it has often been difficult for me to navigate my personal belief system on campus and beyond, when heated Middle East debate includes regular accusations of racism and violence on both the Jewish and Palestinian sides. I like to think my views are always a work in progress.

Going into this trip, I really had no particular agenda for the participants, besides to help them realize that the reality on the ground is always more complicated than what one reads in the newspaper. Once on Israeli soil, it is always much harder to denounce anyone as the sole 'oppressor'.

On our last night of the trip, we sat eating kebabs and reminiscing on the beach at sunset. "I'm going to go home and tell my friends to come here. They need to talk to lots of different people, Israeli and Arab, in order to get a real understanding of the situation," commented a 18-year-old art student from New Jersey. Smiling at him, I realized then that our trip had been a success.

Naomi Lightman is a student at McGill University.

Restoring the past in Poland

By JOHN CRUST

It was a mere fragment of a headstone, but the old Hebrew lettering revealed a few words about a Jewish life. "She gave birth and died," Daniel Wagner read out loud, his Polish colleague Kamila Klauzinska rubbing white chalk into the weathered letters for a better photograph of the engraving. "Bluma bat Zalman. No date. It's broken."

His laptop computer in hand, a laptop containing some 15,000 pictures of beautifully crafted headstones, he began to type amid a foliage of forest green that shades the Jewish cemetery in Zdunska Wola. "This Bluma. I'll try to find the family name . . ." Daniel Wagner is the president of the Organization of Former Residents of Zdunska Wola in Israel, and, in recent years, has found a sense of belonging, a passion and a purpose, in this Polish town of 40,000 where part of his family came from.

A knapsack slung over his shoulder, Daniel moved systematically from site to site in the cemetery. "I always say from a Jewish tombstone you can learn 90 percent of the Jewish culture. The tribes, the symbols, the Hebrew, the holidays, the holy books. It's endless. It's true." Through his efforts, this soft-spoken Israeli professor has helped share this knowledge with the people of Zdunska Wola.

Great bulks of elaborately carved headstones lean every which way. Many are toppled over, scattered about, broken. Many are partly buried under a carpet of wooded growth. Sculptured grey images – a candleholder, a bookcase, two hands – capture the eye. All over, nature's hues delicately highlight pearls of Hebrew.

"The artwork is unbelievable," Daniel said. "There's one beautiful quotation from the Bible. Very tiny. 'Yameinu ketzel ovehr' – Our days pass like a shadow. It's in the corner of the tombstone." As well, the engravings reveal thoughts of love: "The lovers were together in their days and stay together in death." And one memorable epitaph that certainly reflected a unique personality: "Don't write any compliments about me."

A yearning to learn more about his family background led Daniel to Zdunska Wola, his grandmother's hometown. "When I came I just fell in love with the place. It was more of a jungle. There was no path. There was nothing. Just a cemetery. I thought: 'It can't stay like this. It just can't.'"

There were an estimated 10,000 Jewish people out of some 25,000 in pre-war Zdunska Wola. This cemetery, as Daniel sees it, is their remaining mark, their testimonial.

Seven years later, and after countless return trips, Daniel and his Polish colleagues – and, actually, they're very close friends now – are well on their way to saving the cemetery, which dates back to the 1820s. "They were struggling with the world," he said of his Polish friends and their earlier attempts in trying to take care of the graveyard.

Kamila Klauzinska, 33, who just began a doctoral program in Jewish studies, grew up near the Jewish cemetery. This mysterious place, with its strange writing, always seemed abandoned, forgotten. But there was something about the place that made her curious. As a university student, she ended up specializing in ethnology, and, in 1999, her attention was drawn to the cemetery. She wrote her university graduation thesis project on the cemetery.

Her hunt for threads of information – anything – eventually led her to Elzbieta Bartsch, who was often referred to as "the crazy woman" who took care of the Jewish cemetery, or at least tried to. "She was very nice," Kamila said. "She helped me with everything."

"Kamila is like my child," Elzbieta said. Coincidentally, as a student, Elzbieta also developed an interest in Jewish culture. Her mother shared tales of growing up with Jewish neighbors – "good people." In 1984, Elzbieta wrote her university graduation project on the Jewish school in Zdunska Wola. Her advisor urged her to find some Jewish people who were familiar with the school. She met a former resident, Aron Schwartsbart, who lives in Germany. He then introduced her to his sister, Rivka Regina Levy, now in Israel.

Strangers showed up at her door

"Rivka described everything about the school, method of teaching, students, teachers, everything," Elzbieta said. Little did she know that this university project would ultimately lead to a life-long commitment she would embrace deep in her heart. "Aron asked if I would like to act as a go-between to do work with the cemetery, to go to the town government to get the grass cut. I agreed."

The municipal government, and people in general, however, were not as agreeable as she was. "The cemetery was quite a mess," she recalled. "The wall was broken in places. Most of the tombstones were under grass. I got a lock. Before, the cemetery wasn't locked."

Sometimes the town authorities helped, but often she was ignored, even ridiculed. "People in the town hall would avoid me. They told me if I want to cut the grass, then it's my business, not theirs."

So she did what any strong-willed woman would do. She put her husband, Renek, and son, Cyprian, to work in the cemetery. As the vice-principal of an elementary school, she also recruited staff and the kids to help on occasion. The wall was repaired. Another gate was built. In one year, the gate was vandalized and repaired 16 times. Her efforts – all voluntary – perplexed people. Whispers circulated. Was she a closet Jew? What kind of Jewish money was she getting?

"Many people kept telling me: 'Why are you doing it? Give it up.'" Elzbieta shook her head. She had made a commitment. As a thank you, the Organization of Former Residents of Zdunska Wola honoured her with an invitation to Israel.

For years, unexpected strangers from distant lands regularly showed up at her door. Often, they were former Jewish residents. In many cases, they were the children and grandchildren of people who came from here, this mysterious place that shaped and colored a family's pre-war past. On what can be a difficult and emotional trip to the unknown in Poland, they often carried a piece of paper with the name of Elzbieta Bartsch. Today, that piece of paper typically has the name Kamila Klauzinska.

"I feel something special about this place," said Kamila, who has been recognized for her efforts by the Israeli ambassador.

A shout rang out. "A new one! A new one!" Jakub "Kuba" Pawelec, 18, is known for creating more work for everyone. He keeps finding new headstones. "It's now 3,501 matzevot," he announced. Initially, it was believed the cemetery had 800 gravestones.

A sense of pride radiated from Kuba's face. It is the involvement of young volunteers like Kuba who have made this cemetery project possible. In recent years, a kind of youth club took shape and surrounds the cleaning, documentation, and overall care of the cemetery grounds – "the cemetery club," Kuba said. The group has since taken on more of an organized status. They now call themselves Yachad, which is Hebrew for "together."

"All the time I hear: 'Are you Jewish?'" Kuba smiled, shaking his head. "No, I don't have a Jewish past. I don't know. Maybe I have. You don't know. Sometimes a family doesn't want to talk about it." It's believed there are at least a few families in town with Jewish backgrounds, but they keep it pretty well hidden.

Kuba is very open about his interest in Jewish culture, an interest that isn't always welcome. "Older people. You ask: 'Do you remember something about the Jews?' 'No, and I don't want to speak about it.' 'Why not?' 'No, no. I know nothing. I don't want to speak about it.'"

Obviously, these young people are stirring up something and going against some prevailing forces. When Kamila took on a greater interest in the cemetery, she was appalled that some locals treated it as a garbage dump. "People would throw dead animals – dogs, cats, rabbits – into the cemetery," she recalled. "People came to take matzevot and took parts of the wall to build their houses." As she pushed to save this place, rumours grew that she is on the receiving end of big money. Her mail, she said, is regularly opened.

In the early days of Kamila's activism, the authorities didn't exactly embrace this new "crazy woman" obsessed with that Jewish cemetery. Once, when she asked the town to at least haul away the garbage after her team of volunteers labored in a major cleanup, the mayor answered: "We have no money. It's not our cemetery."

Now, more and more people see it as Zdunska Wola's Jewish cemetery, and an intricate part of their history and culture. A new cemetery gate was erected, with financial assistance from the town council, local businesses, and international donors.

"This place could be completely forgotten," Daniel commented. He smiled as Kamila explained the Hebrew and symbolism of a headstone to a visitor. "What I find beautiful is Kamila, this young Polish woman, explaining what is a matzevah. I find it very moving."

Peres responds to Ahmadinejad

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — Iran is a central obstacle to peace in the Middle East, Israeli President Shimon Peres said last week.

In his speech to the United Nations last Wednesday, Peres called Iran a centre of fanaticism and accused it of supporting the terrorist groups Hamas and Hezbollah, preventing the establishment of a Palestinian state and developing a nuclear capacity.

"Tehran combines long-range missiles and short-range minds," Peres said. "It is pregnant with tragedies. The General Assembly and the Security Council bear responsibility to prevent agonies before they take place."

Peres' speech came a day after Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, speaking from the same podium, said Zionists are "murderers" who manipulate global finance and politics to serve their "acquisitive" interests.

Israeli President Shimon Peres cast a long shadow as he left the podium in the United Nations General Assembly last week. In his remarks, he denounced the anti-Semitic screed of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. [RNS photo]

Peres urged Syria to engage in face-to-face peace talks with Israel and to follow the example set by Egypt and Jordan, both of which have concluded peace agreements with the Jewish state. He further predicted that peace with the Palestinians would be achieved within the coming year.

Concluding his remarks, Peres donned a kippah and recited a prayer for peace, in Hebrew and in English.

Iran's president delivered a scathing attack on Zionists at the United Nations the day before. In an address replete with classical anti-Semitic motifs, Ahmadinejad said Zionists are criminals and murderers, are "acquisitive" and "deceitful," and dominate global finance despite their "minuscule" numbers.

Quebec and Israel sign economic agreement

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

An agreement to strengthen economic and technological co-operation was signed by Quebec Economic Development Minister Raymond Bachand and Israeli Deputy Prime Minister and Industry Minister Eliyahu Yishai in Jerusalem last week.

Bachand led a four-day economic and scientific mission to Israel that included more than 40 Quebec businesspeople, investors and researchers.

The new agreement aims to promote trade, investment and collaboration in sectors such as biotechnology, aerospace, information technology, telecommunications and the environment. It complements an agreement between the two governments signed last December in Quebec City, which also encompasses the areas of culture, education and science.

"The signing of this agreement points to success for years to come. It will be a source of very fruitful collaboration and exchange between our two economies," Bachand said in a statement.

The minister said the agreement will build upon existing ties between Israel and Quebec, both at the commercial and scientific levels.

"Israel and Quebec maintain solid ties that are based on a common vision and objectives – the promotion of our know-how, of our culture and of our language.

"The presence of a dynamic Jewish community of 93,000 in Quebec reinforces this relationship. By signing this complementary agreement, Quebec is reiterating the attachment it has with Israel and its wish for a closer collaboration in the future."

Olmert says ceding Golan is required for peace – please see page 41

Greetings from Israel's President Shimon Peres

A country as small in size as Israel has little alternative but to seek greatness in other facets. It must explore strength of spirit, depth of faith, the bid for innovation and the hidden promise of science.

Since its inception, 60 years ago, Israel has proven that despite the shortage of land and water, it developed one of the most advanced and resilient economies on earth. Facing challenges disproportionate to its territorial and demographic scale, as well as existential threats, Israel nevertheless persevered. It did so, through the mobilization of its human resources and military fortitude. It reinforced its democracy and desire for peace.

Israel went through seven wars in its 60 years. Outnumbered and under-gunned, it was self-reliant and confident. Winning wars enabled Israel to triumph in its battle for peace and to sign peace agreements with Egypt and Jordan. Today, it continues to negotiate with the Palestinians, never losing hope of making peace with the entire Arab world.

Shimon Peres

By promoting a policy of peace and being true to the Jewish ethic "love thy neighbour like thyself"; maintaining a defence system that pre-empts danger and a resilient democracy guided by the moral values of our tradition, we can prove that what was bestowed upon us on Mount Sinai was not lost in the desert.

The realization of the Zionist vision is a story that inspired both nation and state. With its establishment, the Jewish people entrusted Israel with the role of preserving and developing the Jewish historic heritage, on the moral platform, proclaiming that "all human beings are born in the image of the Lord."

Committed to our faith and to the value of tikkun olam, Israel must continue to play a role in meeting the global challenges of tomorrow. Being small in size and people, we must be greater in the field of science and serve as a world laboratory in a quest for alternative energy, mostly from the sun, so as to decrease pollution and dry the petrodollar swamp that breeds terror.

Humanity will have to generate water to meet growing human demand, prevent thirst and enable a harmonious and sustainable environment for man and nature. Israel excelled in that domain, and we have to continue investing efforts in this pursuit.

We must also cultivate an innovative teaching system focused on thinking tools and capacities, rather than just on the accumulation of data. The historic strength of the Jewish people was, and must remain, anchored in learning and applying knowledge.

We have proven in the past, and we must do so again in the future, that the Jewish people can serve as leaders at the forefront of modernity and innovation, in order to tackle challenges such as violence and ubiquitous terror which the world now faces.

Likewise, we need to address the challenges which face Jewish communities throughout the world, such as assimilation, a growing gap between the different communities and a greater need to strengthen the ties between Jewish youth in the diaspora and in Israel.

It is precisely because we are a small nation, that the Jewish people must generate the greatness inherent in the human capacities.

Tories blocked Cotler's Iran efforts, says Dion

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Prime Minister Stephen Harper's Conservatives have opposed efforts by Liberal MP Irwin Cotler to bring Iranian President Ahmadinejad to justice, Liberal leader Stéphane Dion told a Jewish audience in Winnipeg last week.

Dion said that the entire Liberal party "has supported Irwin's initiative to hold President Ahmadinejad to account before the UN Security Council or a duly constituted international tribunal for the crime of genocidal incitement as required by the 1948 genocide convention.

"I do not understand why Conservative MPs have attempted to block Irwin's motion in support of this initiative that he brought forward at Parliament's human rights subcommittee," Dion told the Sept. 24 event at Winnipeg's Asper Campus.

Dion charged that "Peter MacKay, then the foreign minister, rejected this initiative as a worthless gesture because [he said] it probably won't work. I don't know how he came to that determination, but when it comes to international law, I think I'll trust Irwin Cotler's opinion over Peter MacKay's."

Dion urged Harper "to reverse this shortsighted decision so that all parties can stand together and put Canada at the forefront again of standing up to genocide on the global stage."

Local Liberal MP Anita Neville said at the event that she – as well as Thornhill Liberal MP Susan Kadis, York-Centre Liberal MP Ken Dryden and others – had "asked questions in the House of Commons about why the Conservatives had blocked Cotler's initiative, but were not given answers."

Dion also said he "is disappointed" that the Oct. 14 election falls on on the first day of Sukkot. Dion said that Harper "had to breach his own law on fixed election dates in order to call this election… And it's not an acceptable answer to say that the Jewish community can vote in the advanced polls. The point is that many Jews will not be able to participate as fully as they would like to on election day itself."

Stéphane Dion addresses Jewish audience in Winnipeg.

Jewish voters should have the same rights as others to "take into account the last week of the campaign before they cast a vote," Dion said to applause from the audience, made up of senior high school students from Winnipeg's Gray Academy of Jewish Education and members of the community.

On the subject of the Middle East, Dion said that a cornerstone of his party's platform is "the right of Israel to exist in peace and security," adding that the Liberals "believe in a two-state solution."

Dion also said that peace "requires an independent, democratic and secure Palestine existing beside an independent, democratic and secure Israel."

He said that the Liberals "support the right of all states in the region and around the world to be free from the threats or acts of force… we unequivocally condemn terrorism – from whatever source, for whatever purpose."

Obscenity as journalism

From the editor's desk

Last week, a reader called to discuss Larry King's interview of Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on CNN. The reader was agitated, angry and even, I would say, anguished.

King had given the Iranian leader a polite, pleasant comfortable platform from which to spout his lies against Israel and the Jewish people, the caller said.

It was bad enough, the caller said, that Ahmadinejad had an hour of prime time television to channel his despicable views to millions of viewers, but worse, and what really incensed the caller, was how meek, unchallenging and even gracious King had been to the Iranian deceiver.

King had played the witting, facilitating fool to one of the world's most dangerous men, the caller insisted. I hadn't seen the interview, but I told the caller that I would obtain the transcripts.

Through the assistance of the Canada-Israel Committee, I received a copy of the transcript of the CNN program that very same day. While reading it, I was shocked at how ingratiating and obsequious King was toward Ahmadinejad. When I read the entire transcript, the shock morphed into a feeling of utter and overwhelming disgust.

CNN and King present his program as a form of "feature" journalism. Of course, it was not journalism in any true or meaningful sense of the word at all. It was almost always nothing higher than popular, celebrity-centred entertainment.

If to offend moral sensibilities is to be obscene, then the program offered by CNN and King last week was obscenity passing itself off as journalism.

The very notion of giving Ahmadinejad unfettered reach to a North American audience during the prime time of television viewing is offensive in the extreme. But setting aside the propriety in principle of his appearance with King, what was King's duty to the viewers as a newsman, let alone as a decent, fair-minded genocide-abhorring individual? Was it not, at the very least, to expose the lies and the prevarications of the person he was "interviewing"?

Good taste and space concerns prevent me from citing a number of examples of the exchanges between King and Ahmadinejad. I cite one small example.

On the subject of the Shoah:

KING: Mr. President, do they not – I know you've denied this for some reason, but do they not – the Zionists, as you call them, do they not come from some history of persecution? Do they not come from the death of millions of men, women, and children?...

AHMADINEJAD: First and foremost, they specifically don't allow anyone to freely discuss the history that happened. They just say, this is our telling of the history, and this is what happened. And everybody just listen to it.

KING: You say it didn't happen?

AHMADINEJAD: Let's just assume – what I'm saying is let more research be done on this – that history. There is a claim that the extent of the calamity was what it was. There are people who agree with it. There are people who disagree. Some completely deny it. Some absolutely agree with the whole account of it.

What we're saying is that we should have an impartial group go do their own research about the extent of the calamity that occurred and then announce a result of that.

This exchange is typical of the exchanges throughout the entire hour-long interview. Ahmadinejad makes preposterously false statements and cleverly applies a veneer of reasonability to them by using the word "impartial," which he knows will resonate well with many of the people watching, when calling for a reassessment of "the extent of the calamity." King sits mute.

Ahmadinejad then slyly ties the reasonability of his doubt about the history which Zionists allegedly do not allow free discussion about – to the creation of Israel.

AHMADINEJAD: Now but what I'd like is really to put this debate aside for a moment. Let's assume that it happened, the extent of which everyone is speaking of. Where did it happen? Did it happen in Palestine? Or did it happen in Europe?

KING: Well, it created Israel.

With this pointedly curt, four-word synopsis of the founding of Israel, King actually aids his pleasant guest in achieving his pernicious aims.

The interview was a free ride, without bumps or turbulence from his CNN host, for Ahmadinejad on his holy journey to persuade North Americans that "the Zionist regime is fundamentally illegal." Those are the words he spoke, after transparently but cleverly and effectively invoking the example of the apartheid regime of South Africa as an example of a country that once existed but no longer does.

Again, King was mute. He let the phrase and the idea that Israel is illegal stand unchallenged.

The agitation and anger of the man who called The CJN was entirely understandable and justified. King's duty to his viewers as a journalist was to try to expose the truth. The minimum standard that he should have applied to his task was one of intellectual rigour and integrity. He fell far below that standard.

Rather than journalist, King played the role of impresario. But the act he presented to the world was not that of a clown or a comic. It was, rather, that of a very dangerous man.

SeeJN CELEBRATING 60 YEARS OF ISRAEL

INITIAL SETBACK, THEN RESOLVE AND VICTORY

Thirty-five years ago, on Oct. 6 at the start of the holy day of Yom Kippur, Egypt and Syria attacked Israel. Egypt recaptured the Suez Canal, and Syria reconquered the Golan Heights at the outset of the fighting. Israeli forces regrouped, however, after the call-up of the full military reserves, and, after some 2-1/2 weeks of bloody fighting, Syrian forces were expelled from the Golan Heights and the Israel Defence Forces crossed the Suez Canal and surrounded the Egyptian Third Army. The war took a severe toll on the Jewish state: 1,854 Israeli soldiers were killed and thousands were injured, and its self-confidence was deeply shaken. Here we see a memorial service for fallen comrades conducted in an army field encampment and a soldier saying morning prayers on the battlefield. [IGPO photos]

Accounting Rocks

On the surface accounting may appear to be just crunching numbers, doing spreadsheets, and getting taxes filed. City nixes part of Holocaust exhibit

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The city of Toronto has pulled the plug on part of a Holocaust education display that compares Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to Hitler.

City officials said the exhibit – a travelling display meant to be shown in schools and on municipal property – was "inflammatory" and would possibly promote hate. But the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, which created the exhibit, is asking the city to reconsider.

"We disagree" with the city's decision, said Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of the Friends. "It is an educational exhibit based on a fellow who wants to create genocide against the Jewish nation."

The four-part display features one section titled, "The Making of a War Criminal." The controversial panel includes an image of Hitler giving a straight arm salute above an illustration of the Auschwitz gate. Nearby is a photo of a smiling Ahmadinejad with a burning devil over his shoulder and an atomic mushroom cloud to the right.

The exhibit's other three panels address various aspects of the Holocaust.

"It is provocative," Benlolo said, "but we meant it to be provocative, to alert people to the danger."

Ahmadinejad has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction and he has sponsored a Holocaust-denial contest in Iran. Iran is pursuing a nuclear enrichment program that many believe is part of a weapons program. Last week at the United Nations, Ahmadinejad repeated his incendiary comments about Israel, saying "the Zionist regime is on a definite slope to collapse."

In rejecting a portion of the exhibit for city-run space, officials said it may "stereotype or promote views and ideas which are likely to promote discrimination, contempt or hatred for any persons," contrary to the city's display policy.

City staff met in a committee last May to discuss the application to host the exhibit and decided in June to reject one panel. There was dialogue between the city committee and the applicant at the time, but there has been no formal request for the committee to review its decision, said city spokesperson Rob Andrusevich.

Benlolo said the Friends will ask the city to include the controversial panel. "They have to understand. This is a special case with the assertion of genocide. They are bound by civic duty to educate the public."

The exhibit's other three panels were displayed at the Scarborough Civic Centre last week, and all four panels are expected to be shown this week at Milton District High School.

Sephardi artifacts go on display

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A year-long exhibit of Sephardi Jewish artifacts from around the world opened last week at Baycrest's Morris and Sally Justein Heritage Museum.

The grand opening of Our Precious Heritage: A Celebration of Sephardi Culture, held in Baycrest's Silverman Garden Court, was attended by more than 100 people.

They heard from several speakers, including Liberal MP Joe Volpe; co-chair of the Baycrest Museum, Anna Vandelman; and vice-president of the Sephardic Kehila Centre, Maurice Benzacar.

"Internationally, [Baycrest] is a place that people look to to establish this type of community. And it is a community," said Volpe, who is not Jewish but often supports Jewish causes.

"Today, we celebrate the Sephardi community. Sephardi Jews have always had a very happy history. It is rich in experience, rich in diversity and in its creativity," he added.

"I want to say to all the members of that community is that that richness, that diversity, that creativity of Sephardic Jews everywhere is very welcome here. We should get more of them to come to our place, because they shape society and create a dynamic and they give it personality. They become Canadian. Ashkenazi or Sephardi, they are known for what they leave behind and what they leave behind is a culture of marvel."

Vandelman said she was excited to present the exhibit two years after the concept was born and thanked the many people who donated their time and money to make it happen.

"The concept for this exhibit started more than two years ago when we met with Maurice Benzacar to discuss our idea. He gave us advice and most wonderful of all,

A disgrace and a danger

Each and every person among the thousands who participated in the Sept. 21 rally at Dag Hammarskjold Plaza in New York City protesting the appearance of Mahmoud Ahmadinejad at the United Nations General Assembly is to be commended and thanked. For protest and indignation were the only appropriate responses to the Iranian leader's presence at the UN and presentation from the podium of the august hall of the General Assembly.

Ahmadinejad's personal obsession to wipe Israel off the map is well documented, as are the many ancillary causes he underwrites in support of that obsession.

So as not to offend the sensibilities of the fair-minded western media and the mostly indifferent western public, Ahmadinejad sterilized his true intentions toward the Jewish state. Even so, his language betrayed his ultimate purpose. In the address to the General Assembly, he echoed the same ugly themes that have been the hymnal and anthem of Jew-haters for centuries. He referred to the "Zionist murderers" who are "acquisitive" and "deceitful," and who control international finance despite their "minuscule" number.

The following day, from the very same General Assembly podium, Israeli President Shimon Peres placed Ahmadinejad's speech in its proper historical context. "Yesterday, on this very stage, the Iranian leader renewed the darkest anti-Semitic libel – the Protocols of the Elders of Zion… an attempt to bring to life one of the ugliest plots of history."

Later in the week, Germany's Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier at the General Assembly also condemned Ahmadinejad: "The statements of the Iranian president about Israel are irresponsible and unacceptable. The blatant anti-Semitism of his speech this year was intolerable and demands our mutual condemnation," Steinmeier said.

On Sept. 26, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told the Security Council, which had been called to convene by the Arab League to discuss Israel's settlements in the West Bank, that "the United States of America will be asking that the council convene again to take up the matter of one member of the United Nations [Iran] calling for the destruction of another member of the United Nations [Israel]."

The next day, the Security Council unanimously passed a resolution directing Iran to halt nuclear enrichment work. It also urges Iran to co-operate with the UN International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, which is investigating whether Iran had conducted research on an atomic weapon.

Thus, nothing has changed with and for the Iranian leader. He flouts the world, mostly but not only the West, even as he panders to it.

Israel's president described Ahmadinejad best: "He is a disgrace to the ancient Iranian people. He is a disgrace to the United Nations."

But the Iranian leader is also very dangerous, and he must be stopped.

Greetings from the prime minister

It is my distinct pleasure to extend my warmest greetings to all Canadians observing Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

The High Holidays are a period for contemplation and celebration in Jewish communities around the world. This ancient New Year tradition is an opportunity for members of the community to reflect on the past year and look forward with hope and optimism to the year ahead.

As you enjoy this precious time with family and friends, you may take great pride in your rich cultural heritage and the many contributions Jewish Canadians have made to the growth and prosperity of our great nation. By honouring these traditions, you are ensuring the continued strength and unity of the community.

On behalf of the Government of Canada, please accept my best wishes for a happy, healthy and prosperous New Year.

Stephen Harper
Prime Minister of Canada

Greetings from the consul general

On behalf of the Consulate General of Israel in Toronto, it is a pleasure to extend my sincere wishes to the Toronto Jewish community as we celebrate Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur in the year of 5769.

Amir Gissin

While the challenges facing Israel and the Jewish community are great, we look to the future through a hopeful and optimistic lens. As the Jewish people, we are unified and strong in our willingness and readiness to overcome whatever it is that may confront us.

At this time, I would like to take the opportunity to shed some light on a very important and symbolic gesture made by local rabbis of all religious sects in Toronto that are united in the attempt to bring the local Israelis and the local Jewish community together on Yom Kippur. The concept is Yom Kippur Lekulam (Yom Kippur for all).

This initiative will provide explanatory services that will be open and free to Israelis throughout the city of Toronto. [Editor's note: As our synagogue structure doesn't permit unrestricted access to worship services during the High Holidays, the Israeli consul general has asked community leaders to make special provisions for Israelis, perhaps before Kol Nidre or during a break on Yom Kippur afternoon, or at some other time. See page 16.]

This experience reflects the customary way secular Israelis observe the holiday. The main focus of this initiative is to offer the young generation of Israelis who reside in Canada a unifying and hospitable experience that will connect Israelis to their Jewish and Israeli identity. We must provide an option for this generation who in many cases do not have a Jewish educational or communal experience in Toronto.

I would like to extend my gratitude to all those involved in such a necessary and significant initiative.

During this time of reflection, I would like to wish you Chag Samayach and best wishes in the year ahead.

Amir Gissin
Israeli Consul General
Toronto

Tempest in an election teapot

What exactly was "shameless" about Canadian Jewish Congress co-president Rabbi Reuven Bulka accepting an explanation from Prime Minister Stephen Harper about his decision to hold the election on Sukkot ("Community handed Tories a victory," CJN letters, Sept. 18)?

As I understand this tempest in an election teapot, the letter writer believes that in a secular society, governments must ensure that elections do not interfere with Jewish yom tovim. To be sure, it's not an ideal voting date for observant Jews. However, the right to vote, the most sacred of democratic responsibilities, remains intact, with numerous days to cast one's ballot in advance.

It's true that on Oct. 14, observant Jews who would be working for particular candidates will be unable to volunteer their services. This, however, does not stop any Jewish volunteer from participating on all the other days of the writ.

Surely, we cannot hold any government's feet to the fire, demanding that our holidays be declared non-election days. In Israel, this would be perfectly appropriate. In Canada, the best that we can do is point out to governments when our holidays fall and hope they can work around it. This is exactly what the CJC did – which was more, I should add, than any other Jewish group in the country.

Another year of global academic anti-Semitism, anti-Israelism

By MANFRED GERSTENFELD

The academic year 2007-08 saw again many anti-Israeli and anti-Semitic incidents in various countries.

To select important events and see trends, one has to focus mainly on Britain, Canada and the United States, where many of the problems are concentrated. Academic anti-Semitism and anti-Israelism are, however, rife in other countries, as well. In these countries, incidents are hardly monitored, and the illusion is thus often created that they do not exist.

Israel Apartheid Week has become an annual ritual since it originated at the University of Toronto four years ago. The international website of the project gives no information about who is behind it, other than stating that "prominent Palestinians, Jewish anti-Zionists and South Africans have been at the forefront of this struggle."

Israel Apartheid Week or similar anti-Israeli activities took place in February 2008 in 25 locations in the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom, South Africa and the Palestinian Authority. The organizers at the Canadian universities this year also reached out to include other campus organizations such as the United Black Students and Indigenous Environmental Network. The week at the University of Toronto for the first time ended with a one-day conference for high school students.

Yet another ritual is the boycott motions at the annual conference of the University and College Union (UCU) in Britain. This year the UCU, which includes most of British university teachers and related academic staff, adopted three anti-Israeli motions. One says that British academics should consider the moral implications of working with Israeli universities and discuss "the occupation" with Israeli colleagues with whom they work.

Although the UCU motions against Israel are usually referred to as proposed boycotts, their current content now stops somewhat short of directly calling for such actions. This is linked to the fact that in 2007 the UCU received a legal opinion that boycotting Israel would be illegal. Details of this text have not been made public.

Two parties are surprisingly almost absent from the boycott-motions debate. One is the great majority of UCU members who want their union to focus on salaries and social conditions instead of political issues. The other major absentees are the Israeli universities. One would have expected those who are attacked to be the first to respond. They have, however, left the battlefield to British Jewry and its activists.

Mike Whine, a director at the Community Security Trust, the defence agency of the United Kingdom Jewish community, lists a number of British universities as "hostile territory" for Jews. These include Sussex University, Exeter University and the School of Oriental and African Studies at the University of London. Various incidents concern the Oxford Union, a student debating society. It held an event in November 2007 at which Holocaust-denier David Irving and Nick Griffin, leader of the far-right British National Party, debated the subject of free speech.

In the United States, an initiative that serves the anti-Israeli racists on campus is a statement of the ad hoc committee to defend the university. In November 2007, professors from the University of California-Santa Cruz, Princeton University, Harvard University and Columbia University jointly circulated a petition supporting academic freedom. By August 2008, this declaration had about 650 signatures, including those of academics representing almost every Ivy League school.

The statement begins by stressing the essential role of academic freedom. The language of the petition directs the blame for these limitations at pressure or lobby groups. It singles out pro-Israeli activities. According to supporters of the declaration, the Israel lobby has taken control of the universities through donations, linking anti-Semitism to being anti-Israeli, and other types of influence. The signatories also state that the right to scrutinize their work belongs primarily to their peers.

Anti-Semitism and anti-Israelism are rife in a number of U.S. universities. A prime example is the University of California-Irvine. The past academic year was again marked by numerous anti-Israeli events at UC-Irvine. In February 2008, an Israel Apartheid Week was held. This included a lecture by Imam Mohammad Al-Asi titled "From Auschwitz to Gaza: The Politics of Genocide." He said Israel was an apartheid state and that "Israel is on the way down… your days are numbered. We will fight you until we are martyred or until we are victorious." In May 2008, Imam Amir Abdel Malik Ali praised in a lecture Palestinian mothers who sent out their children as suicide bombers.

Despite the UC-Irvine administration's indifference to anti-Israeli developments, its chancellor, Michael Drake, was invited as a guest speaker at the National Summit of Hillel to lead a session on "Fostering a More Civil Society." Hillel International president Wayne Firestone was severely criticized for this by a variety of voices in the Jewish community in the United States and abroad.

Columbia University also has a substantial recent record of anti-Semitic and anti-Israeli actions. The fact that it only concerns a limited number of the staff is no consolation. Columbia stood out negatively once again in September 2007 when it invited Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to speak at its World Leaders Forum. At the lecture, Columbia president Lee Bollinger challenged Ahmadinejad and others did so, as well. Yet the invitation gave legitimacy to the Iranian president in "civilized" society.

Many incidents have taken place on other American campuses. Some involved anti-Semitic graffiti, vandalism or personal insults, such as at the University of North Dakota, Rutgers University and UC-Santa Cruz, another university at which structural anti-Israeli bias exists.

In Italy over several months in 2007 and the beginning of 2008, a list appeared on the Internet of 162 Italian university teachers of Jewish origin. When the Rome Jewish community complained to the Interior Ministry, the Internet service provider took the site off the web.

On the other hand, effective counteractions are also increasing in several countries. There is now more exposure of Islamist racism and anti-Semitism on American campuses. In Canada, protests against anti-Israeli actions are on the rise. The British government condemned the UCU motions. There were also initiatives by the EU and British authorities to enhance academic collaboration with Israeli universities.

External monitoring bodies are more and more exposing the hate culture and biased actions of some university lecturers. Campus Watch director Daniel Pipes unmasked the hypocrisy of the ad hoc committee by pointing out that the anti-Israeli academic Noam Chomsky has no problem speaking at American universities and added: "When I go on universities, I can barely give a talk."

The supporters of the ad hoc committee should largely be seen as an elitist interest group that tries to protect obsolete privileges. Defending some parts of what currently is called academic freedom is of no moral value but rather an expression of extreme corporatism.

An investigation of anti-Semitic incidents at UC-Irvine by members of the Jewish community of Orange County led to a report, in February 2008, that exposed the structural problems of anti-Semitic and anti-Israeli hate at one American university rather than dealing only with a number of incidents. It is of major importance as a potential model for similar investigations at other universities, Columbia and UC-Santa Cruz being among the prime candidates.

There are also, however, many factors less visible than incidents that slowly pervert the teaching atmosphere on many campuses. These include, for instance, the selective choice of books for libraries or the one-sided assigning of books in lecture classes. These are almost underground phenomena that are not monitored in any way.

A problem apart is self-hating Israeli academics, some of whom are outright advocates of Israel's genocidal enemies. Others, less extreme, defame Israel in various ways, while remaining silent about the context in which Israel operates or without even mentioning the murderous attitudes that permeate Palestinian society.

It is mistaken to assume that hate campaigns can be largely counteracted or balanced by positive programs on Israel. Because of their extremism, the hate campaigners' damage to Israeli and Jewish causes runs deeper than the superficial impression left by the positive activists. This also reflects the intense motivation of Muslim and far-left racists and anti-Semites. Their activities often go ahead due to the passivity of university authorities. These may oppose anti-black or anti-Muslim racism, but are frequently far more reluctant to take similar actions against anti-Semitism and its new mutation, anti-Israelism. It is rather easy to prove these double standards.

The examples of anti-Semitic and anti-Israeli actions mentioned in this essay, on campuses in a number of countries, are far from comprehensive. Currently, no one is tracking such incidents systematically and globally. There are several reasons why such a watching structure is needed. Israel Apartheid Week has demonstrated that developments on one campus may spread to others, both in the same country and internationally. Only an international monitoring body can keep track of such developments and provide the expertise to take action against them.

It would be mistaken to consider the academic onslaught on Israel and Jews an isolated phenomenon. What happens to Jews has usually been a pointer to structural elements of the societal environment in which it takes place and a sensor of events to come. This is also the case as far as academia is concerned.

There is a need for more comprehensive external investigations of the academic world, particularly its openness to hate teaching and bias. This includes elements such as political correctness, the promotion of ideology, the distortion of knowledge, and the protection of the hate promoters and falsifiers of facts, as well as other malfunctions of campus administrations.

Manfred Gerstenfeld is chairman of the Board of Fellows of the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs. His book Academics against Israel and the Jews was published in 2007.

Opinions

Dreams and dignity conquer hardship

This past summer, natural disasters dominated the news: floods ravaged the U.S. Midwest, and wildfires devastated northern California. Thousands watched their homes and communities disappear. In natural disasters, lives are ravaged along with the countryside.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

The question nature forces upon the survivors of catastrophes is simple: what do you have when you have nothing?

The question seems absurd at first. If you've lost everything, you truly have nothing. These victims have nothing, and they feel like they're less than nothing. Indeed, the midrash refers to this sentiment in saying that "poverty is like death." Faced with extreme loss, it feels as if life isn't worth living. Job, after suffering the loss of his family and wealth, is urged by his wife to curse God and commit suicide.

But this is wrong. Even when stripped of everything else, people still have their character, with the courage to cope with their circumstances and the dignity to transcend their limitations. Although impoverished and homeless, man still holds the keys to his own heart.

Character is our most precious possession. David, a shepherd boy armed only with a slingshot, can take on Goliath because he has something Goliath lacks: character. David's weapons are courage and cunning, and these weapons are held in one's heart, not one's hands.

Dreams are another priceless possession that can never be destroyed. No matter the situation, man can still pursue his dreams. And when the dispossessed pursue their dreams, they can change the world.

The prophet Zachariah describes the Messiah as poor and riding on a simple donkey. These words remind us that if you want to redeem the world, you need to hold on tight to your dreams, even through poverty and hardship.

Throughout history, many have faced the question of "What do you have when you have nothing?" Some have given up. But those who continue to hold on to their dreams have changed the world.

Earlier this year, I visited the Museum of the Jewish Heritage in New York. On display was a chupah made in 1946 by the Joint Distribution Committee. This chupah is unique, because it was made for Holocaust survivors who were marrying after surviving the war.

When I saw it, I was overwhelmed by emotion. Isn't it absurd to try again at life when you have lost everything? But I realized that these couples where not truly bereft. They still had their dignity and their dreams, the most important possessions in the world. And it's these couples, with nothing else but each other, who went about rebuilding the Jewish world.

These poor survivors, who had nothing in their hands, actually had everything they needed, tucked away in their hearts.

Making the change from awful to awesome

For a few North American Jews, the Yamim Nora'im, the days of awe, will be profound. Yom Kippur will culminate a repentance process that begins with the start of the month of Elul more than five weeks earlier. These Jews will have put their own spiritual houses in order through contemplation, prayer, study and asking forgiveness from those they possibly wronged. When they gather together in synagogue on Yom Kippur, they will feel the power of parallelism, as the prayers, the rituals and the community reinforce their already powerful personal experiences.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Alas, for most North American Jews, the Yamim Nora'im will have a different meaning. Nora in Hebrew can mean awesome, but it can also mean awful. And for most of us, especially our youth, these High Holidays will be more awful than awesome. Enduring two or three days of communal prayer on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, they will sit uncomprehending through long, boring prayers, sung in an ancient tongue, glancing at their watches, waiting for the interminable services to end so they can gorge themselves at their holiday meal.

Some dramatic moments might break the monotony, such as when the Torah is paraded around or the shofar is blown. The cantor and choir will periodically entertain with a particularly moving or catchy tune. The rabbi will try to shake his flock from its spiritual torpor. But for most, the experience will be so excruciating they will vote with their feet, avoiding the synagogue for another year, when, out of ancestral guilt or family loyalty, they will endure it all again.

As with the emperor's new clothes, doesn't anyone ever want to shout, "The king is naked," admitting that this isn't working? Given all of our community's smarts, given all the emotional and financial resources that our families and our synagogues invest in the High Holidays, doesn't anyone wish that we could do a better job?

The problem starts with our collective ignorance and passivity. Judaism is not meant to be enjoyed like an annual spiritual enema. Nor is Judaism seasonal, to be sampled three days a year in synagogue in the fall, then for a few days at home during the winter for Chanukah and during the spring for Passover. And Judaism is deeper than our juvenile, "let's be friends, make amends, now it's time to say I'm sorry" approach to the High Holidays suggests.

Perhaps this year we can trigger both a personal and institutional revolution in Judaism. It must begin with individuals ready to commit, to plunge into the depths of this ancient but surprisingly relevant way of life and system of thought. We need a revolution of learning, wherein we commit to serious study and engagement to understand what Judaism is all about, and what it can teach us.

We need a burst of doing, wherein we stop approaching Judaism as consumers, sampling what we like and avoiding what we dislike, to instead become owners, taking responsibility for our spiritual and communal lives. And we need to ride the cycles of celebration, understanding that the weekly Sabbath and the periodic festivals give us great opportunities to delight in life and move beyond a model of Judaism as all work, guilt and heartburn-generating foods.

If we as individuals start working toward a more engaging, expansive, upbeat, profound, sophisticated, integrated approach to Judaism, our synagogues will both lead and follow. Too many synagogues and too many services are built on the assumption of Jewish ignorance, creating a lowest-common-denominator Judaism. Rabbis too often forget their mandate to teach, to challenge, to stretch congregants. Instead, they just keep to "tradition" which often means presiding over a large, bored audience. If rabbis felt that their congregants were open to deeper approaches, most would respond happily.

With elections taking place everywhere – in Canada, the United States, Israel, even Jerusalem – it's easy to dismiss calls for reform as empty promises. But North American Jewry desperately needs change. Even if Jews only enter the synagogue two or three times a year, we all deserve a quality experience. We should start with smaller, more intimate groupings and shorter, less passive services. But we should not stop until we have revolutionized our synagogues – and ourselves.

Ghosts of a 'lovely place'

The first time that I set foot in the German concentration camp Ravensbrück was not long after the collapse of the Berlin Wall. With the fall of the Soviet Union, the camp site and its valuable archives had opened up to researchers from the West. Then, as now, summer had suddenly given way to autumn, and a bitter wind had whipped up, chilling visitors to the camp.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

I remember, that first trip, deplaning in the Berlin airport in the darkness of the early morning hours, weary from the sleeplessness of travel. I recall dozing off repeatedly during the two-hour drive from Tegel to Ravensbrück, waking periodically and glancing out the window. The leaves had already turned, and the trees were ablaze with the colours of autumn. I remember opening my eyes and catching sight of some brightly coloured stucco buildings peeping through the oranges and golds of the trees, and just opposite, a pristine lakeshore.

In my grogginess –momentarily forgetting my ambivalence at this, my first trip to Germany – I thought, "What a lovely place." Just then, the driver pulled up in front of a large building. We had arrived at Ravensbrück. This place in the German countryside whose beauty had so struck me had been the site of suffering, brutality and murder.

And now, once again, the incongruous beauty of the place and its surroundings strikes me, disturbs me. At the edge of the town of Furstenberg, for centuries a resort town nestled among rivers and lakes, Ravensbrück has become a centre for research and reflection on the war, and in particular, on the experiences of women during the war.

Utilized during the Nazi era as a prison camp for German women dissidents, Ravensbrück offers Germans a means to moral reconstruction, a place to honour the memory of German women willing to suffer the consequences of opposing Nazism.

Over time, the camp absorbed women from other countries who opposed the Nazis, and the present site memorializes prisoners by country of origin. For years, the story of the Jewish women among these political prisoners at Ravensbrück was absorbed into the general story about political dissidence. The history of the later Jewish prisoners, men and women who arrived during the last months of the war as the Russian army advanced westward and the German front retreated, went unmentioned for years while the camp was under Soviet control, part of the general erasure by the Soviet Union of the Jewish genocide. And for many of the thousands of Jewish Holocaust survivors – men and women – who passed through this camp near the end of the war, Ravensbrück was not prominent in the stories they told. It figures for them as a transit camp, after enduring the Lodz or the Warsaw Ghetto, or the Auschwitz complex, or other ghettos and camps.

Since the 1990s, Israeli and German researchers have worked together on a shared project to reconstruct the experiences of the Jewish women who were murdered at, or who survived, Ravensbrück. Along with a handful of dedicated independent researchers, they have made the recovery of their stories a mission and a labour of dedication. The Ravensbrück Memorial Museum has made a strong effort to incorporate this body of history and memory into the educational mission of the camp, opening a new special exhibition on the Jews at Ravensbrück. The exhibit documents their history, and focuses on several personal accounts. It includes drawings by and of Jewish prisoners, a miniature Tanach that one Jewish woman kept with her until she was killed, and testimonies by survivors of Ravensbrück.

The incongruous loveliness of the locale is made all the more jarring when one walks the streets of the charming Furstenberg and pictures the town during the war. One thinks of vacationers dining at a lakeside restaurant, indifferent to the suffering of the women on the opposite shore.

Today, the museum at Ravensbrück works with schools and other institutions. The work of the Ravensbrück Memorial Museum generally, and now its particular focus on Jewish women, plays an important role in confronting the past and its lessons for the future.

But as people bicycle through the paths at Ravensbrück and picnic on its grounds, it's impossible not to think that the past is still with us, and still haunts us.

The Kirshner File

Tzipi Livni's ideological transformation

Poised on the cusp of succeeding Ehud Olmert as Israel's next prime minister, following her narrow victory over Shaul Mofaz in last month's Kadima party leadership primary, Tzipora Malka (Tzipi) Livni has come a long way in terms of her ideological transformation.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Livni, the current foreign minister and the chief negotiator with the Palestinians in the Annapolis process, has been one of the leading proponents of a two-state solution as a means by which to resolve the Palestinian problem, defuse Palestinian radicalism, and preserve Israel as a democratic and Jewish state. In words of praise, Livni's friend, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, has said that she has had "the foresight to know that a Palestinian state is in Israel's greatest interest."

Not so long ago, however, Livni – the scion of a Zionist Revisionist family whose parents were members of the Irgun militia – opposed territorial compromise, voted against the Oslo accords and argued that Palestinian statehood had to be stopped at all costs. But after launching her parliamentary career in 1999 and becoming a cabinet minister in Ariel Sharon's Likud government, Livni moderated her views, supported the unilateral withdrawal plan from the Gaza Strip and joined Sharon and Olmert in bolting the Likud to form the centrist Kadima party.

Such was her image in many Palestinian circles that the Palestinians let is be known that they preferred Livni to Mofaz as Kadima's newest leader and Israel's next prime minister.

In speeches leading up to the primary, Mofaz – the former minister of defence and chief of staff of the armed forces who aspired to be Israel's first Sephardi prime minister– upset the Palestinians. He warned against reaching "agreements on the core issues," given the spectre of instability in Palestinian politics at the present, and suggested that a better alternative would be to implement confidence-building measures to revive their flagging economy.

By contrast, Livni – who stands a good chance of becoming Israel's first female premier since Golda Meir – has worked to produce a so-called shelf agreement with the Palestinian Authority ever since the United States launched the present round of talks at a conference in Annapolis, Md., in November 2007. The parties have until the end of 2008 to reach an agreement, in which Israel and the Palestinians would resolve their fundamental differences over land, final borders, Jewish settlements in the West Bank, security arrangements, and Jerusalem and Palestinian refugees, but delay implementation until the situation improves.

Current conditions do not favour a breakthrough. Hamas, the Islamic fundamentalist organization that has controlled the Gaza Strip since June 2007, continues to oppose Israel's existence, never mind its legitimacy. The Palestinian camp is thus deeply divided, and Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority, in hardly in a position to honour, much less defend, agreements that may be signed with Israel one day. As Livni has said, "Gaza is not just an Israeli problem. It has become an obstacle to the formation of a Palestinian state."

Israel has also created difficulties. Despite having accepted the 2003 "Road Map" peace plan, which forbids the construction of new settlements and the expansion of old ones in the contested West Bank, Israel has continued to build thousands of housing units in settlement blocs there it intends to keep.

According to a Peace Now report released in August, Israel has nearly doubled construction in the West Bank, prompting the United States to chide Israel over its unilateral actions. "What we need now are steps that enhance confidence between the parties," Rice said, "and anything that undermines [such] confidence ought to be avoided."

Like Olmert, who formally stepped down as premier last week after submitting his resignation to President Shimon Peres but who will act as caretaker prime minister until a new government is chosen, Livni believes that Israel should retain these settlement blocs. But concurring with Rice, she has characterized the expansion of West Bank settlements as "unhelpful" and declared that Israel will need "to dismantle more settlements" as part of an accord with the Palestinians.

Livni and Olmert also share the view that Israel's occupation of the West Bank is unsustainable. Olmert, having observed that the Greater Israel vision of retaining the whole of the West Bank is nothing less than delusional, has warned that "time is not on Israel's side." In a corollary, he has noted that "the international community's willingness to accept Israel as a binational state is growing."

This idea, having been embraced by some Palestinians who were formerly identified with a two-state solution, "endangers the continuation of our existence as a Jewish state," he has asserted. "Some day soon, sooner than we think, we will long for the solutions that some of us reject today."

In this vein, Olmert has said that if Israel fails to sign an agreement with the Palestinian Authority, Israel will eventually have to deal with Hamas. Livni concurs, having said that Israel cannot afford to procrastinate any further. "The extremists are getting stronger," she said in an implicit reference to Hamas. "Time works against the moderates."

Tzipi Livni flashes a smile as she votes at the Kadima party leadership primary.

Having suggested that a third Palestinian uprising may erupt should an agreement elude Israel and the Palestinians, Livni has said, "Now most Israelis understand that having two states in the lands comprising historic Palestine is an Israeli interest."

By the same token, she has warned that Israel cannot acquiesce to Palestinian statehood unless the Palestinians consistently combat terrorism and agree that a future Palestinian state must meet Israel's security requirements, including the supervision of border crossings.

Like Olmert, too, Livni thinks that the repatriation of 4.6 million Palestinian refugees to Israel – the right of return – is a non-starter.

In talks with Abbas, Olmert discussed the possibility of admitting into Israel some 20,000 Palestinian refugees on humanitarian grounds. Livni has adopted a tougher approach, being of the opinion that such an inflow could set a precedent and jeopardize Israel's Jewish identity.

Livni has also taken a harder line with respect to Israel's on-again, off-again negotiations with Syria, though she supports the talks in principle.

She believes that Syria has used them to break out of its international isolation rather than to forge a rapprochement with Israel. In addition, she thinks that Syria should show good faith by cutting ties with Iran and preventing Hezbollah from smuggling weapons into its base in Lebanon.

Israel's indirect talks with Syria got under way last spring under Turkey's auspices. Four rounds have already taken place in Istanbul, but a fifth one was postponed in deference to the Kadima leadership race.

Syrian minister Buthaina Shaaban reported in June that progress has been achieved, but not enough to warrant a resumption of direct negotiations. Syria's foreign minister, Walid Muallem, has struck a less conciliatory note, saying that no real headway has been made. But Syria's president, Bashar Assad, has said that the talks have opened the door to peace.

Livni's attitude to Iran's budding nuclear program has been measured. Although she has said that Olmert exaggerated the Iranian threat for political gain, she favours international economic sanctions to address the problem, and has not ruled out military action. Mofaz, a Jew of Iranian origin, was far blunter, threatening air strikes to disable or destroy Iran's nuclear installations.

Artifacts gathered from more than dozen countries connected us with his daughter, Raquel," she said, referring to Raquel Benzacar Savatti, chair of the Sephardic heritage exhibit committee.

"We took bits and pieces from everywhere and made the whole much more than the mere sum of parts."

Vandelman said they gathered artifacts from more than a dozen countries, including Morocco, Tunisia, Iraq, Iran, Egypt, Turkey, Greece, Syria and India, and from more than 40 individuals from the Toronto Jewish community.

"These precious artifacts which you have entrusted to us make this event a reality. The focus of our exhibit is on culture and tradition," Vandelman said.

"We hope you will find your journey into the Sephardi world interesting and inspiring just as we have. We have no doubt that the thousands of people who live here at Baycrest and those who visit everyday will enjoy this unique artistic and educational exhibit."

The exhibit includes artifacts and displays such as a red and gold henna dress worn by Sephardi brides in the Moroccan tradition; a table set for the Mimouna, an after-Pesach festival during which people drop into one another's homes to share pastries and sweets; a Shabbat lamp from India; hand-painted ketubot; and a silver case to protect and adorn a Torah from Egypt.

Rivka, 8, dressed in a traditional Moroccan Henna dress, admires a display case of cultural artifacts from her Sephardi heritage.

Vandelman said that since many of Baycrest's residents can't physically make their way down to the museum, the museum will make their way up to them.

"What we do is our museum-on-wheels program, and we will make presentations on the floor of the hospital and the home. We take objects from the museum and we go up on the floor, and allow people to touch everything and explain everything so that they, too, get a piece of the experience."

Benzacar, who was one of the first Moroccans to move to Toronto, thanked the staff and volunteers for putting the exhibit together.

"In the 51 years since I first arrived from Morocco, I have devoted much of my time to preserving the customs of our Sephardic heritage," he said.

"When I first arrived, the few families that had recently immigrated from Morocco naturally sought each other out, because as much as we tried to integrate into the Jewish life in Toronto, it wasn't so simple."

He said their customs were very different from Ashkenazi customs and soon the growing Sephardi community gathered to create the first Sephardi synagogue in Toronto at the YMHA at Spadina Avenue and Bloor Street in 1957.

"Today, more than 50 years later, I am proud of what we have accomplished in this city. We are doctors and lawyers, entrepreneurs and entertainers, rabbis and educators. We have contributed to the community at large, all the time keeping the traditions of our ancestors alive through our synagogues and day schools, and most importantly our homes," Benzacar said.

"This exhibit showcases how in every aspect of our Jewish life, we savour our heritage. It makes me feel proud."

Admission to the museum is free, and guided tours are available. For more information about the exhibit, call 416-785-2500, ext. 2802.

Shuls plan Yom Kippur program for Israelis

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Twelve Greater Toronto Area synagogues are participating in a Yom Kippur outreach effort to local Israelis. The project was initiated by Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general in Toronto.

At a meeting in late August, Gissin told about 20 representatives of synagogues and the Israeli community that he was inspired by a project in Israel called Yom Kippur L'Kulam (Yom Kippur for Everybody). The project, which includes an educational component, was started for secular Israelis at a small number of synagogues and has since expanded.

All the Yom Kippur services in the Toronto program will be free of charge, geared to Israelis of all ages, and will include prayer, the blowing of the Shofar, discussion, explanations, and an opportunity to ask questions.

Some synagogues will have a special program for Israelis before Neilah, the closing service of Yom Kippur. Others will be open for Neilah, and some for the whole day. Some programs will be in Hebrew, others in English, and the Jewish Russian Community Centre in Thornhill will offer a Russian/English program.

At Kehillat Shaarei Torah, Rabbi Reuven Tradburks will lead the program along with some Hebrew-speaking members of the congregation. There will be a discussion about Yom Kippur, some type of Yizkor memorial service, prayer and singing.

The idea appealed to Rabbi Tradburks, the congregation's spiritual leader, in part because of his involvement in an explanatory Yom Kippur afternoon service in his first rabbinic position about 15 years ago on Staten Island. As well, he said, he was in Israel this summer and met someone who asked if he might be able to help Israelis here who have no connection to Jewish life become connected.

Thornhill's Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre has hosted more than 1,000 Israelis for Yom Kippur for several years. This year, its annual late-night Yom Kippur program will feature Israeli speaker Rabbi Yechezkal Sofer.

As part of the new initiative, the centre is increasing distribution of its Hebrew-language Holiday Guide, which is circulated to as many as 20,000 homes at no charge, according to a press release.

The centre's goal, according to the release, is "to reach the entire Israeli community and communicate the idea that Yom Kippur is meaningful to young and old alike, and is intended for all Jews, regardless of their level of religious observance."

The GTA has an estimated 60,000-plus Israelis.

Participating synagogues are Kehillat Shaarei Torah; Zichron Yisroel in Thornhill; Temple Sinai Congregation of Toronto; Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre in Thornhill; the Jewish Russian Community Centre in Thornhill; Chabad of Danforth-Beaches; Chabad Jewish Discovery Centre in Mississauga; Chabad Lubavitch of Aurora; and Chabad on the Avenue.

It's offical — Dead Sea Scrolls at ROM

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

With Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty's recent announcement, it's now official – the Royal Ontario Museum will present the largest exhibition of the Dead Sea Scrolls outside of Israel next summer.

The Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA) and the ROM have collaborated to produce the exhibition that will be on display from June 27, 2009, until Jan. 3, 2010, in the ROM's new addition, the Michael Lee-Chin Crystal.

"The ROM will be the only museum in Canada where they will be on display… This is truly a once-in-a-lifetime chance to see these historical writings. This will be the largest collection of scrolls on exhibit outside of Israel's borders," McGuinty said.

The 16 scrolls, discovered in 1947 buried in a cave in Qumran in the Judean Desert by a Bedouin boy, will be divided into two groups of eight and each group will be on display for three months.

The display will include fragments of 16 scrolls, written between 250 BCE and 68 CE, from the books of Genesis, Deuteronomy and Psalms, as well as the sectarian Community Rule, War Scroll and Messianic Apocalypse.

McGuinty thanked the co-chairs of the Dead Sea Scrolls community advisory panel – Mohammad Al Zaibak, co-founder, president and CEO of Canadian Development and Marketing Corporation; Tony Gagliano, CEO of St. Joseph's Media; and Jonas Prince, chairman of Realstar Group – for their dedication in fostering dialogue between diverse communities and faiths.

"I'm grateful as well to the Tanenbaum family for sponsoring the Anne Tanenbaum lecture series, a series of lectures that will help us better understand the significance of the scrolls and their significance to all of us today," McGuinty said.

ROM director and CEO William Thorsell, who led the press conference, said he hopes the exhibit will be more than just a display, but also an educational experience.

"We hope to generate one of the great conversations in the history of Ontario and beyond about these foundation documents that are shared among great traditions, the Jewish tradition, the Christian tradition and the Islamic tradition that sees these as divinely inspired documents," Thorsell said.

The Distinguished Lecturer Series, to be presented in conjunction with the exhibit, will feature scroll and Second Temple period scholars, including Emanuel Tov, a Hebrew University professor and the editor-in-chief of the Dead Sea Scrolls Publication Project; Yuval Peleg, an IAA archeologist, and Dan Bahat, a Bar Ilan University professor and a former chief archeologist of the city of Jerusalem.

Dead Sea Scrolls guest curator, Risa Levitt Kohn, an alumna of York University and University of Toronto and director of the Jewish studies program at San Diego State University, said the exhibit will also include artifacts from ancient sites in Israel. The objects include a scroll jar that preserved some of the scrolls for 2,000 years, "perhaps better than our modern methods," she said, and portions of the ancient gate leading to the Temple.

The press conference took a political turn when Thorsell praised McGuinty for his dedication to arts and culture in Ontario and criticized Prime Minister Stephen Harper for his recent decision to cut $45 million from arts and culture funding, and his comments about ordinary Canadians.

"I think when ordinary working people come home, turn on the TV and see a gala of a bunch of people at, you know, a rich gala all subsidized by taxpayers claiming their subsidies aren't high enough, when they know those subsidies have actually gone up – I'm not sure that's something that resonates with ordinary people," Harper said in Saskatoon recently, where he was campaigning for the Oct. 14 election.

"It's really nice to be in the presence of a leader who doesn't ridicule the culture and the people who care about culture," Thorsell said.

When asked about Harper's position on arts and culture, Ontario Minister of Culture Aileen Carroll said, "I'm disappointed in what this government's approach has been. I can't understand that everything that we understand here in this province isn't understood by the federal government."

Consul General of Israel Amir Gissin said he is proud that Israel was given the opportunity to partner with the ROM and the Ontario government to mount the exhibit.

"We hear questioning about the State of Israel, and where we are going and how long we are going to be around… But when we look at it today, we know that Israel is a place of great creativity of great innovation in the areas of science and culture," Gissin said.

"But we should let the scrolls, that are a very important part of our mutual history, to speak for itself."

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE JEWISH COMMUNITY

As Canadians, we have a right and responsibility to participate in the democratic process and have our voices heard. Over its three years of existence, the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) has helped the Jewish community to have impact beyond our numbers. We have done so by engaging our thousands of members and friends across Canada within the multi-partisan political process to advance prospects for a safe and secure environment for Israel and the Canadian Jewish community. Organizations funded by charitable dollars are not allowed to engage in partisan politics under law. CJPAC is the only Canadian Jewish organization that can truly help support those who support us and make sure our friends are elected and re-elected.

The Jewish community has a notable voting influence in less than 20 ridings across the country - yet there are 308 ridings at stake. Dozens of ridings are decided by less than a few thousand votes. In the 2006 election, one candidate won by only 28 votes in a riding with a population over 85,000. Therefore, we must engage strategically, and most importantly we must vote.

It is also our communal and religious responsibility to play an important role in our country's well-being by participating in the choice of its leaders. Rabbi Yitzhak taught, "A ruler is not to be appointed unless the community is first consulted" (Talmud, B'rochot 55a). In this election, we are being consulted. Our vote, our time and our support are our answers.

At stake in this election are issues of concern to all Canadians, in addition to issues of special concern to the Canadian Jewish and pro-Israel community. In order to have your say on these issues, it is up to you to get involved.

1. It's up to you to get informed.
Learn more about where the candidates and parties stand on your issues. Visit www.itsup2you.ca to learn about your local candidates, read or listen to interviews with the party leaders, and find out about issues of interest.

2. It's up to you to get involved.
Volunteering for an election campaign is a great way to build relationships with Members of Parliament and other decision-makers. These relationships are essential to ensuring our collective voice is heard. It's also a great opportunity for networking, professional development and community involvement. You will experience first-hand how the political process works. Those who have volunteered in the past know how important and fun it can be. Fill out our volunteer form at www.itsup2you.ca/register, and CJPAC will pair you with the campaign of your choice.

3. It's up to you to support candidates.
With election fundraising and spending limits it is easy to support friendly candidates in a significant way. Every dollar counts and there are generous tax credits for political donations. Through CJPAC, you can target your support to our community's friends who need it the most. New era in Conservative Judaism ushered in

By Ellin Bessner

The sound of a dozen shofars blowing in unison marked the official launch of the new Centre for Conservative Jewish Life (CCJL), the eventual permanent home of Beit Rayim Synagogue and School, and its partner, United Synagogue Day School.

The Centre will be located on the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, an initiative of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign.

The CCJL will house both the egalitarian Conservative congregation, the only one of its kind in York Region, as well as elementary school students from the area who will attend the northern campus of the Toronto-based USDS.

"What an opportunity we all have to make a difference," said Karen Baron, co-chair of the Building Committee of Beit Rayim. "We will be able to look back and say that we had the privilege of being part of the historic Lebovic Jewish Community Campus."

An architectural rendering of the Centre for Conservative Jewish Life.

Close to 200 people from the community attended the launch, just steps aways from the land on which the new centre will be located on Bathurst Street and Rutherford Road. The two partners will each conduct separate fundraising campaigns to collect a total of $12 million necessary to complete the project. The site plan was submitted in July for approval from the City of Vaughan, and that is expected sometime in the fall of 2008.

"What we are on the verge of creating here is nothing less than the foundation for the future of Conservative Judaism in Canada and beyond," emphasized Rabbi David Eligberg, in a rousing D'Var Torah.

At the ceremony, officials with USDS announced they would begin offering classes on the site, in modular units, in the fall of 2009. Registration for the Early Years program is now open.

According to Leonard Abramsky, president of USDS, moving north is a "logical progression for USDS to grow along with the community."

USDS's two elementary school campuses (Bathurst and Bayview) have long been feeder schools to TanenbaumChat, which is also located on the Lebovic Campus at the Kimel Family Education Centre, he said.

"Imagine opening the van doors in one location, and being able to drop off your daughter in Grade 6 and your son in Grade 9," Abramsky mused.

While the fundraising campaigns get underway, Beit Rayim and USDS are moving forward to offer the community joint programming under the auspices of the Centre for Conservative Jewish Life, according to Bill Mandelman, Beit Rayim's president.

The first events include a series of lectures on cyber warfare against Israel and what to do about it. There is also a Holocaust Education Week talk by a survivor whose family fled Europe for Shanghai.

"This marks an historical moment for the Jewish community of Toronto and kudos must go to USDS and Beit Rayim for their boldness and belief in a flourishing Jewish future for our community," said Ted Sokolsky, President and CEO, UJA Federation. "The Centre for Conservative Jewish Life represents a return to the visioning and great faith in the future that previous generations displayed as they helped build the great schools and synagogues outside the downtown core. In those days, generous congregations south of St. Clair helped seed and support schools and shuls in unknown territories north of Eglinton, beyond Lawrence and even up to Sheppard. Initiatives such as this go a long way to restore the incredible tradition."

The Centre for Conservative Jewish Life is scheduled to open Phase 1 no earlier then the spring of 2010.

Jewish community all-party forum planned prior to federal election

By Daniel Horowitz

On Sunday, October 5, members of Toronto's Jewish community will have the unique opportunity to hear – firsthand – about the issues of concern to them from local candidates representing the Conservative, Liberal, NDP and Green parties.

Sponsored by UJA Federation, CJPAC, Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region and the Canada Israel Committee (CIC), the non-partisan Jewish community Political Forum, at 7:30 p.m. at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation (470 Glencairn), will cover issues of urgent Jewish concern before the federal election on October 14.

Many members of Toronto's Jewish community may choose to vote the day after the forum, on October 6, in the advance poll, if they are not able to cast their ballots on Sukkot.

"I believe that it is our responsibility to know the key issues before we vote, and I strongly encourage all members of our Jewish community to come out and take advantage of this wonderful opportunity," urged David Koschitzky, Board Chair, UJA Federation. "As Jews, it wasn't that long ago that we were without a strong, united voice when it came to matters of interest – and importance - to our community. Let's take advantage of the privileges and rights we have today."

The October 5 all-party forum, at Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, will give voters the chance to have their questions answered.

"UJA, CJC, CJPAC and CIC are co-sponsoring this forum because we all agree that in order to cast an educated vote, it is critical to know where the parties stand on issues important to the Jewish community," said Josh Cooper, Executive Director, CJPAC. "This all-party forum should do just that; give members of our community an up close and personal chance to learn about party policies on issues that matter to them."

Philanthropy flourishes during stock market instability

By Daniel Horowitz

As Canada's economy faces new challenges, the business of philanthropy - prevalent during both good times and bad - becomes more important than ever, with an even more heightened sense of urgency.

Take, for example, United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2009, which despite the present economic trials and tribulations, is moving along at an impressive clip, $3 million ahead of last year's pace from 9,000 donors, and, on course toward its goal of $70 million.

"What's important to remember is that when the economy is unstable, times are that much more difficult for the countless people who rely on our support, across the street and across the globe," explained Fran Sonshine, chair of the campaign along with Henry Wolfond. "Our community has always been resilient; they always seem to find ways to come through for one another, and today is no different. Despite economic uncertainty, our community members refuse to submit to feelings of doom and gloom, but rather, remain optimistic and generous as they do year after year."

"While the economy is in a somewhat fragile state, the generosity of Toronto's Jewish community remains second to none," said Wolfond. "It's the old story; it's easy to give when times are good, but you can really tell someone's character by how they react when times are less than optimal. Once again, this year's campaign is showing just how visionary and compassionate the Toronto community really is."

That compassion and generosity were evident during the recent United Jewish Appeal telethons, which saw almost $3 million raised in a five-day span.

"I canvassed a young man who increased his gift from $100 to $500 even though it hasn't been a great year for him," said Doris Starr, a UJA telethon volunteer. "He told me that although it is challenging for him to give larger gifts every year, it is clearly necessary as the cost of living is always increasing – not just for him – but for those who depend on our help. That's compassion."

Despite the economy, United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2009 is ahead of last year's pace.

"I was worried about canvassing for UJA this year," said volunteer Allan Jeffries. "I usually get great personal satisfaction and fulfillment from it, but with the economy as shaky as it is right now, I was scared that I'd have no success with donors. Turns out I was wrong – this Jewish community is amazing. People pull together and give 'till it hurts – even when times are a bit tough."

That's a sentiment shared by United Way of Greater Toronto President Frances Lankin.

"We're pleased with the progress of this year's campaign, but we know this could be a tough year for many people and their families in Toronto," said Lankin. "We've set our sights a little higher because in a year of uncertainty the pressure on our community will be greater. However, we have on our side the well-known generosity of this city, and the fact that when our community faces challenges Torontonians roll up their sleeves, come together, and help each other."

Manhattan rally attracts hundreds of Toronto students

By Howard English

Adorned with red "Canadians at The UN rally" T-shirts and armed with a passion for activism, some 200 university and high school students from Toronto and southern Ontario joined thousands of participants at last week's Stop Iran Now rally in New York.

The students were recruited by Hillel of Greater Toronto; National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL), which works on university and college campuses outside Toronto; and Toronto's B'nai Akiva schools (Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot). Organizers arranged pre-rally educational sessions with notable speakers, such as Iran expert Micah Halpern and American Jewish Committee executive director, David Harris.

"Iran is not the same as the Iranian leadership," Halpern told the students. "Iranians appreciate Western culture, but the Iranian leadership doesn't."

The rally at Dag Hammarskjold Plaza, across from the United Nations, coincided with the presence in New York of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to speak at the UN. Rally speakers featured, among others, former federal Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, Nobel Peace Prize winning author and Holocaust survivor Elie Wiesel and former Israeli cabinet minister Natan Sharansky.

Wiesel urged the United Nations to indict the Iranian president for propagating genocidal policies. "President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran is a threat to world peace and he should not be here in New York. His place is in... a United Nations prison cell," Wiesel said.

Despite a long bus ride to New York and back, the students were buoyed by the experience.

"I'd never been to a rally before. It was vey exciting. It was nice to meet people who felt as I do about human rights. I feel less alone in my beliefs," said first year UofT student Valery Kondratiev.

"I'm more empowered," said second year York University student Eli Weinstein. "When you stand up for something like this, you realize how lucky we are as Canadians, to have our freedom."

"It was cool to be part of something that brought so many people from many backgrounds - not only Jewish people. Everyone was so enthusiastic that there were so many Canadians," noted Jane Harris-Koblin, in her third year at U of T.

Hillel and its educational programs are financially supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. The Toronto contingent was led by NJCL chair Ricky Diamond and Elyse Lackie, the co-chair of UJA Federation's Impact Toronto division.

May calls Israel a 'bulwark of democracy'

The CJN invited all the federal party leaders to take part in interviews with the paper during the current election campaign. Last week, Elizabeth May, the leader of the Green party, took us up on our request.

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Elizabeth May wants you to know that she and the Green party are "not anti-Israel."

May, on a stop-over in Toronto during her campaign last week, spoke to The CJN in an exclusive interview to explain her party's foreign policy as it relates to the Jewish state, as well as to clear up what she said are fallacies about her personal feelings toward Israel and the Jewish community that she said are being spread online to malign her.

The latter includes a recent photo being circulated on the Internet that shows May, microphone in hand, addressing a pro-Lebanon rally in August 2006, just after the start of the Second Lebanon War.

Other photos in the series depict Hezbollah flags and slogans on prominent display among the marchers.

May acknowledged that she was at the rally as part of her campaign to be elected as the new Green party leader, but she was adamant that her participation was part of a "call to non-violence."

"It was billed as a peace rally, and I attended it as a peace rally. I was very clear… I stood on the back of a truck to say I condemn the Hezbollah missiles [being fired] into Israel and that we had to have a ceasefire. I also said that Israel should not be bombing targets not associated with Hezbollah," May said.

May acknowledged that the rally was very critical of Israel, but she said that of all the speakers she heard, "I know I was the only person to condemn Hezbollah."

"I'm not uncomfortable at all with the fact that I was there, and I find it fascinating that now, more than two years later, I'm being attacked for something that was very easily explicable."

With regard to the Greens' foreign policy on Israel and the Middle East, May said her party supports Israel's rights as a free and democratic state.

"We fully support Israel's right to exist," she said, adding that her party works closely with Israel's own Green party, which is led by the deputy mayor of Tel Aviv, Peer Visner.

She said she envisions her party joining in initiatives with other green parties in the Middle East, including those in Jordan and Egypt.

"Our approach is that building peace and conflict resolution in the region requires condemnation of those things that are unacceptable, whether Hamas or Hezbollah… and that we need to build in the kind of development assistance that raises children who don't think that guns are part of their childhood," she said.

On that note, May said her party would earmark funds to help the Palestinian Authority with issues such as the "poverty that fuels the terrorism," but that any aid would come with strict rules that it "not be tied to militarism or another agenda."

"We need to recognize that Israel is the bulwark of democracy and healthy society" in the Middle East, May said.

She added that her party would "consistently" support the State of Israel while also embarking on "consistent application of development and peacekeeping" in the Middle East.

May has not yet been to Israel. She said she was to have visited last year to take part in the Golda Meir Forum on Sustainability, but she needed a hip replacement. She said she plans to travel there with her daughter in the spring to visit family and meet with her Israeli counterparts.

When asked what her party's position is on the upcoming followup to the 2001 UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa – dubbed Durban II – May said her party would not consider participating.

"It's become a mockery. I can't think of any other UN process that I would avoid [other than] that one," she said.

May then praised Israel's environmental sector, citing its water-sharing plans with neighbouring countries, solar power technology advances and other "green" tech in the country, saying she believes there are many "promising" partnerships to be made between Canada and Israel.

The Greens have had two brushes with anti-Semitism in the campaign thus far.

May removed the party's B.C. North Delta candidate, John Shavluk, due to anti-Semitic remarks he allegedly made on a website in 2006, and she's since warned her Ottawa South candidate, Qais Ghanem about "coming quite close to the line" for remarks he's made on his blog, in which he criticizes Israel and he refers to it as "the Occupier."

Ghanem's, she said, has posted comments that are "clearly critical" of Israeli foreign policy without being anti-Semitic.

"I may be out on thin ice on this one, but I feel… you can be critical of foreign policy without being against that nation, or worse yet, against its people," May explained. "I've gone over it with him. He's clarified his view, and he's someone, as I know him, who's very supportive of all peacemaking efforts and not in any way anti-Semitic. He's critical of Israel, there's no question."

She acknowledged that there has been some internal party strife over Ghanem's position, particularly among Jewish candidates who think he "went too far," but in the end "our policy is what it is [on Israel], and we can accept a range of views. But [Ghanem's] situation is as close to the line as we would ever get without discontinuing a candidate."

In her personal time, May is pursuing her goal to become an ordained Anglican minister. She said her studies have brought her into contact with the Torah, and that its lessons and laws resonate deeply with her.

"I love studying scripture, and find it fascinating to get into the real Hebrew translations of Genesis and what was really being said there, especially in light of environmental issues," she said. "Our platform opens with a saying from Proverbs: 'Without vision the people perish.' There's a lot to be learned from [the Old Testament]. Judeo-Christian and Islamic traditions all share a common root as the tribes of Abraham."

May joked that there are people in her party who are "worried" about what kind of theology she's interested in, and she said she's a fan of author and former nun Karen Armstrong, and specifically her book The Battle For God, which recounts the rise of fundamentalist movements within Islam, Judaism and Christianity.

"This kind of analysis I find extremely useful in understanding who we are right now on this planet… but also in understanding where the dangers lie in becoming so secular, that people of faith and religion feel they have no place; similarly, the dangers of the fundamentalist strains that have been responsible for so many horrors, [including] the assassination of [former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak] Rabin, the blowing up of the twin towers... I mean, horrors in the name of the same God," she said. "There's a balancing that our society needs."

May said there's also a misnomer being applied to her party in that it's of the "left."

She said that's not the case.

"We want to bring in income-splitting. We want to reduce corporate tax rates, tied to the incentive of reducing greenhouse gasses. We want to maintain a healthy manufacturing sector. Some would say [these are policies] of the right," she said.

Indeed, in the mid-1980s, May was a senior policy adviser to Tory environment minister Tom McMillan, under then-prime minister Brian Mulroney.

May said that if elected, her party would raise the GST back up to six per cent

"Small 'C' conservatives don't want to see the government overspending while making stupid decisions," such as lowering the GST, she said, taking a swipe at the current Conservative government's taxation policies. "You want to cut where it helps. Income taxes, payroll taxes and direct more money to low-income Canadians. What [the lowered GST] does is deprive the government of the revenues it might need," May said. "I don't think a [six per cent] GST would be felt by people… because I can't find anyone who tells me that they were richer when it went from six to five [per cent]."

Green party calculations predict that a one per cent increase in GST would give the country $3 billion a year for "community level" needs, such as mass transit, sewer and water facilities, recreation areas and bike paths, May said.

Her party would also scrap the Conservatives child care tax benefit – which provides $100 a month per child up to age six – in favour of "fully accessible child care spaces, starting with early learning educational experiences, as well as support for those families who want to raise a child at home."

Election 2008

Dryden seeks to hold Liberal stronghold

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Hall of Fame NHL goaltender and former cabinet minister Ken Dryden is defending his political crease in this election against three rookie candidates in the riding of York Centre.

Up against the Liberal incumbent – in what has long been a safe seat for his party – are Rochelle Wilner for the Conservatives, Rosemary Frei from the Green Party and the NDP's Kurtis Baily.

Ken Dryden

Baily could not be reached for comment for this story.

York Centre has a population of about 113,000 people, with an average family income of $80,688 and 17 per cent of residents listed as Jewish, according to the 2006 census.

The riding is bounded by Highway 401 in the south and Steeles Avenue in the north; Yonge Street, the hydro transmission lines, Bathurst Street and the west branch of the Don River in the east; and Keele Street, Grandravine Drive, Sheppard Avenue and Jane Street in the west.

Rochelle Wilner

In 2006, Dryden defeated Conservative challenger Michael Mostyn by 9,400 votes to secure a second term. He first ran for the seat in 2004, when Art Eggleton announced he would not run again.

The riding has been a Liberal stronghold since 1962. The last Conservative to win York Centre was Frederick Stinson in 1958.

Wilner, a past president of B'nai Brith Canada, believes the riding is ready for a change and said she's relying on her experience with social justice issues to win the seat.

"I'm an advocate for human rights and spent most of my adult life working to fight against hate, bigotry and anti-Semitism in the community," she said.

Wilner said she decided to join the political fray this year as a Conservative because she believes in Prime Minister Stephen Harper's stances on crime, taxation and Israel.

Rosemary Frei

"Harper has declared unwavering support for Israel" throughout his term, she said.

She noted that under his watch, "Canada was the first country to cut funding to Hamas [following its victory in Palestinian elections in 2006]... and first to pull out of Durban II," next year's followup to the 2001 UN anti-racism conference, which critics fear will degenerate into an anti-Semitic hate fest in the same way its predecessor did.

Wilner said that locally, York Centre constituents are also concerned about crime, as the riding abuts the Jane-Finch corridor, one of the city's more troubled areas.

"The level of crime with guns has increased dramatically over the last year, and the Conservatives have introduced tough new measures on crime. Voters want safe streets," she said.

Dryden told The CJN that he has consistently supported the Jewish state's "safety, security and sustainability."

"The question has always been how best...to find answers. It is on that bedrock that everything else is placed," he said. Dryden added that while the Harper government last year started a Security Infrastructure Program – a three-year, $3 million pilot project to help ethnic communities beef up security at community centres and places of worship – the Liberals intend to introduce their own $75-million program.

Tories expected to hold north Winnipeg riding

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Kildonan-St.Paul, the north Winnipeg federal riding where most of north Winnipeg's Jewish population of 2,500 to 3,000 live, should be a shoo-in for the Conservative party this time around.

The north end had traditionally been a socialist bastion. David Orlikow, a member of the Jewish community, held the seat – then called Winnipeg North – for the NDP from 1962 to 1988. He was defeated in the 1988 election by Liberal Rey Pagtakhan, who held the seat until 2004.

In 2003, the electoral boundaries were redistributed, and the largely Jewish part of the riding was transferred to the new Kildonan-St. Paul, which also incorporated more conservative areas to the north of the city and a section of Winnipeg east of the Red River. (The river used to be the riding's eastern boundary.)

In the 2004 election, candidate Joy Smith won the riding for the Conservatives in a squeaker over Liberal candidate Terry Duguid, a former city councillor and mayoral candidate.

(Pagtakhan chose to run in what had been the western part of the older riding and lost to sitting NDP MP Judy Wasylycia-Leis, who has been a strong supporter of Israel over the years.)

Smith captured 37 per cent of the vote to Duguid's 36 per cent. The NDP candidate ran third with 22 per cent.

In the 2006 election, a re-run between Smith and Duguid, the sitting MP increased her share of the vote by 4,000 – taking 43 per cent of the votes cast – while Duguid's tally slipped to 33 per cent. The NDP candidate tallied just 20 per cent.

Smith, a mother of six, has been a teacher and business entrepreneur. She served one term as a Conservative MLA in a south Winnipeg riding, but narrowly lost in her bid to be re-elected.

In Parliament, Smith is chair of the standing committee on health. She is also chair of the Canada-Ukraine Parliamentary Friendship Group, vice-chair of the Canada-Israel Canadian Parliamentary Friendship Group, a member of the Canada-USA Parliamentary Association, the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association and the CPC Health Caucus.

She is a strong and vocal supporter of Israel and has represented the government at many high-profile Jewish community events in Winnipeg.

Smith said last week that her campaign seems to be going very well. "I have been very busy going door to door," she said. "I am reminding people that they have to go to the polls to vote."

She added: "People seem to appreciate my hard work and high visibility."

The Liberal challenger this time around was supposed to be longtime broadcaster and humorist Lesley Hughes.

However, in a move praised by Canadian Jewish Congress, party leader Stéphane Dion asked for and accepted her resignation last week after it came to light the radio broadcaster had made comments in 2003 that Jews had been aware of the planned attacks on the World Trade Centre on Sept. 11, 2001.

Even though Hughes will not be running, her resignation came after the cutoff for nominations and, as a result, her name will still appear on the ballot.

The NDP candidate is Ross Eadie, a visually impaired, longtime NDP activist and former school trustee (2002-2006) in the area who in the past ran unsuccessfully for city council (1998) and the Manitoba legislature (1999). He served as campaign manager for the NDP nominee in Kildonan-St.Paul in the last federal election.

Eadie conceded that he has a steep hill to climb to win, but he said that "it's not impossible."

He added: "If you don't try, you don't succeed. I am spending 12 hours a day going door to door talking to as many people as I can."

The Green party candidate is first-time candidate Kevin Bowkett, a researcher for the ETC Group, an NGO that focuses on food safety and the effects of technology on farming worldwide.

Liberals opposed to Durban II participation

When asked by a Gray Academy high school student whether he would recognize Jerusalem as the capital of Israel, a hush fell over the room. Dion's complete answer was, "I hope we will find a healthy solution for Jerusalem."

Asked by The CJN whether Harper ought to be applauded for making Canada the first country in the world to suspend direct aid to Hamas when it won Palestinian elections in 2006, Dion answered that it was the Liberal government that listed Hamas and Hezbollah as terrorist entities in 2002.

"It was the Liberal party that put the policy… in place that enabled Canada to list terrorists such that Mr. Harper could do this," Dion said.

When asked whether Harper ought to be credited for saying that Canada will not participate in next year's followup to the 2001 UN anti-racism conference – because of fears it will be an anti-Semitic hate fest like it's predecessor – Dion said, "We [the Liberals party] do not want to be at this conference."

He said that only the NDP has said "maybe yes, maybe no" to attending Durban II.

Dion also spoke about his promise of $75 million in funding to "at risk" ethnic communities to help beef up their security.

"This announcement is important for communities at risk… [The money] will be needed [to protect] your centres, synagogues, your schools… The cost to your community is growing."

Dion said the 2004 firebombing of United Talmud Torah's Saint Laurent branch in his Montreal riding was a key reason he decided to pledge the funds.

"[When the firebombing occurred], I took it personally… That day I swore to myself that I would do everything in my power to protect our children."

Wilner relying on experience with social issues

Dryden said that a Liberal government "would not participate" in Durban II, adding that it would "not be useful" to do so.

"What is Canada's diplomatic role in the Middle East and elsewhere? There are very few places where the answer is a military answer," Dryden said.

He said that Canada needs to "work with the world" for change, including on the issue of peace-building in Israel.

"One of the first things I did as minister of social development, on a visit to Israel, was to have a conversation with my [Palestinian Authority] counterpart," Dryden said.

"At first, I didn't think it was promising at all. Then it became clear that there was a role [for Canada]. If the PA was to become the significant 'other side' to the peace process that they have to be, they've got to look, function and see themselves and others as a government must do. Canada [under the Liberals] is pretty good at governance… at working with other people. But we lost, and those initiatives were stopped dead."

On the domestic front, Dryden said that he was waging his campaign less on local riding issues than on "broader, deeper" national issues such as poverty and child care, which he said also have a local impact.

"If we're going to do anything of any substance [about] poverty, it takes a country to do it… a visceral belief that it's just not right the way too many people have to live in Canada," he said.

Frei, who is Jewish, is a Toronto journalist as well as a founding member of Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian Relief Committee. She holds a master's degree in molecular biology.

She said that the Green party's view on the Middle East sees Canada acting to "reduce tensions and find working solutions" without "taking sides" in the ongoing Israel-Palestinian conflict.

"The Green Party calls for a two-state solution… and would call on the [international community] to broker an agreement between Hamas and the [Fatah-controlled] PA," Frei said, citing her party's "Vision Green" foreign policy platform.

Frei said her message to constituents is "that the status-quo isn't cutting it. It's not benefitting the long-term health of democracy, the economy and the environment."

Her party advocates an approach that "goes beyond the Liberal's Green Shift plan" and removes and places taxes on chemicals "known to be deleterious to human health." "I think the Green Party approach is a fundamental re-examination of Canadian values," she added.

Liberal, Tory candidates spar over Iran issue

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Liberal MP Irwin Cotler went on the attack against the Conservative government's stance on Iran, suggesting that Stephen Harper's words of support for Israel are at variance with his government's actions.

"The prime minister has done excellent work in his statements with regard to Israel, but words are not as important as deeds," the Mount Royal incumbent said at an all-party panel discussion organized by the Jewish community last week.

Cotler had little difficulty scoring debating points against neophyte Conservative candidate Andrea Paine's representation of Harper as a principled, unequivocal supporter of Israel and the Jewish community. Paine, who was an aide to Human Resources and Social Development Minister Monte Solberg, is running in the riding of Lac St. Louis.

Both Cotler and Paine said in their opening remarks that which party is more supportive of Israel and Jewish concerns should not be the key issue for voters, but they then proceeded to enumerate what the Liberals and Conservatives had done or not done in this area.

Paine said the Conservative caucus is "virtually" unanimous in its support for Israel, which she said Cotler and Outremont New Democratic incumbent Thomas Mulcair, who was also on the panel, could not claim of theirs.

Cotler criticized the Harper government for not supporting a bill he presented last year calling for the prosecution of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for incitement to genocide in the International Criminal Court.

Addressing Paine, he added, "And why are there four Canadian trade commissioners in Iran right now promoting trade with Iran?"

Cotler also attacked the Conservatives' claim that they changed Canada's voting pattern on anti-Israel resolutions, noting that Canada voted for seven such resolutions last year.

Paine said Harper is clearly opposed to any buildup of nuclear arms in Israel, but the Conservatives had not voted for Cotler's bill, because they were waiting to see what Israel's position was on such an initiative.

"We were not sure what the position of the Israeli government actually would be. We were also concerned that if the bill passed, the pro-Palestinians would spin that into a victory for themselves," she said.

"We were being cautious and waiting to follow Israel's lead."

Cotler corrected her saying that Israel is behind the attempt to prosecute Ahmadinejad.

The discussion, moderated by Canadian Jewish Congress regional treasurer Robert Presser, also included Carole Freeman, the Bloc Québécois incumbent in Chateauguay-St. Constant, and Claude William Genest, the Green Party candidate in the riding of Westmount-Ville Marie.

Genest, a film producer, broke up the mud-slinging with his lively account of how he discovered, after growing up a "hockey-playing, French-Canadian, baptized Catholic" that he was, in fact, Jewish.

He was in his 20s, broke and travelling in Israel at the time. After his self-discovery, he spent two months in a yeshiva in Jerusalem.

He's changed course since then, and admitted that today he lives with a Palestinian woman.

He avoided discussing the Middle East conflict, and stuck to his party's goal of creating a sustainable economy that's not dependent on oil.

Mulcair, who was elected in a byelection last year after many years as a Quebec Liberal politician, also presented his Jewish credentials: his wife is a Paris-born Sephardi woman. He also mentioned his trip to Israel this past spring.

Freeman talked about her introduction this year of a bill that would amend the Criminal Code to make it a hate crime to vandalize any buildings, such as schools and community centres, identified with a religious or ethnic minority.

She was the only candidate to wish the audience a good holiday, concluding with "Happy Rosh Hashanah," her only remarks not in French.

The candidates took only written questions from the audience, which were selected by the organizers.

One questioner wrote: "The Liberal record on Israel pales in comparison to that of the Harper government, and the Jewish community feels taken for granted by the Liberals."

Asked how he reconciles his support for Israel with "certain elements hostile to Israel" in the NDP, Mulcair said he didn't know any.

"Some do have slightly different takes on issues, but what is important is the position we take at the end of the day as a party, and I am extremely comfortable defending them today."

Freeman had to defend Bloc leader Gilles Duceppe's participation in a huge demonstration in Montreal two years ago during the war in Lebanon. "That demonstration was for peace; it was not anti-Israel," she said. The presence of a small number of Hezbollah supporters was denounced on the scene by Duceppe, and later in a press release, she said, a position that Federation CJA president Marc Gold thanked him for in a letter.

Gold opened the discussion by stressing how important it is for every Jew to vote for the candidate of their choice, and the federation is urging the community to use the advance poll on Monday, Oct. 6, if Oct. 14, the first day of Sukkot, is not possible.

The discussion was sponsored by the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee, the Quebec-Israel Committee and CJC.

USDS kids raise awareness about childhood cancer

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Aron Brager, a teacher at United Synagogue Day School's Beth Tzedec branch, fought back tears as he watched students at his school draw pictures and write messages in colourful chalk on the school playground.

Pastel happy faces and thoughts including "You rock!" "You can do it," and "I hope you get better soon" were created for children dealing with childhood cancer as part of a project in collaboration with the Pediatric Oncology Group of Ontario (POGO) for Childhood Cancer Awareness Month in September.

Jake Greenberg [F. Kraft photo]

"They don't even realize how unbelievable this is," said Brager, a 26-year-old gym and computer teacher, who had skin cancer as a teenager and has been cancer-free for seven years. "This is pretty inspiring to me."

The branch's involvement with POGO isn't new.

Last year's student council made the organization its annual fundraising project. Students sold flashlight keychains and participated in a "runathon" to raise money for POGO. The run-athon, held at the school, was called "Run for a Child who Can't."

They raised $6,000, far exceeding their goal of $1,000.

Brager has "really given relevance and meaning to raising the money," said Carole Traister, a Grade 2 and 3 general studies teacher who also serves as elementary school student council adviser.

"When the children found out that he was a cancer survivor and that cancer can be beaten, I think it rejuvenated our push for raising funds," she added.

More recently, parents showed up early at the school on the morning of Sept. 22 to draw hopscotch outlines on the playground and write messages of their own to kick-start the September project.

USDS was one of about 30 schools province-wide to take part in the project. Leo Baeck Day School was also involved.

"Our school is really big on promoting community service and community work, and teaching kids the importance of giving to the community," Traister said. "As much as we promote academic excellence, we also promote giving back to the community."

Julie Grammer and Talia Aaron, both Grade 2 students of Traister's, wrote separate messages saying, "I hope you feel better." Talia said she wanted children in the hospital to smile and feel good.

Hannah Lefton, 7, said she likes to play hopscotch, and also to help people. Her mother, Bonnie, said she is "just happy to work in affiliation with any organization that helps children."

Jake Greenberg, a Grade 3 student who enjoys playing hockey and being with his friends, wrote, "I hope cancer gets beaten."

Brager added his own message, in bold capital letters: "Never give up!"

NIF head praises Livni's election

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The director general of the New Israel Fund in Israel (NIF), Eliezer Yaari, spoke enthusiastically about the selection of Tzipi Livni to head the Kadima party during his recent appearance in Ottawa.

"A woman leading a party in Israel... this is a tremendous thing, irregardless of what party the woman is coming from... I personally believe that the core of social change in any society are women," he said Sept. 18 at Agudath Israel Congregation.

Stating that the left-leaning NIF has "become more a movement that tries to influence the government," Yaari said he had spoken to Livni a couple of weeks prior to her victory in party primaries.

"We decided that we have to talk to all the candidates. It was an interesting meeting, because she [was] foreign minister. She met us in her small office in Tel Aviv rather than in her new office in Jerusalem. I told her that as foreign minister, she should be meeting people in Jerusalem," he said.

Explaining that the NIF is an organization that seeks to bring justice and equality to all in Israel, and to bring together Jews and Arabs in a quest for peace and equal citizenship, Yaari said, "We were the first to use the word 'empowerment' in Israel. There was no Hebrew word for it before us. We were the first to preserve the environment as a methodology for living."

The NIF seeks partnerships with groups whose ideologies are in synch with its own.

"Everyone can be a partner with NIF, as long as you respect pluralism, as long as you respect equality in gender and as long as you accept that Israel is a sovereign, Jewish country, but we have people who are minorities. We are all about values, values that guide us," Yaari said.

The NIF has recently been approached to help with a plan to build communities for former Russians in Israel. "They approached NIF because we will do the work by asking what they want rather than telling them what we want. This is another partnership with another segment of society that was not being heard and we are empowering them," he said.

"We are investing in start-up grants to groups of people and we are also training them [almost 600 different groups every year] in finance, training and building coalitions," he added.

Yaari, a well-known media personality in Israel, worked for many years at the Israeli Broadcast Authority as a reporter, editor, anchorperson, producer and programs director. He is also a published author.

"In Jerusalem, I continue to write, to do radio, but 16 hours a day I am doing [work for the NIF]. This is exciting, and I think it is a huge contribution to the State of Israel," he said.

NDP minister helps organize concert for Israel

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A multicultural concert celebrating Israel's 60th Anniversary put on by the Manitoba-Israel Shared Values Roundtable was attended by more than 900 people of many different faiths and backgrounds at Winnipeg's Pantages Theatre.

The Shared Values Roundtable is a group that was initiated by Christine Melnick, Manitoba's NDP minister of water stewardship, and the late Harold Buchwald, a leading member of the Jewish community.

"Our group recognizes that the people of the Manitoba and Israel share many important values, such as belief in a democratic system of government, respect for freedom of speech and human rights, and commitments to public health care, public childcare and education," said Melnick, who has been to Israel a number of times.

"Manitobans and Israelis have a strong commitment to family and community and believe that high literacy rates and public services are important building blocks that form the foundation of a society that honours freedom of opinion and values differences" she added.

The Sept. 14 concert, which was dedicated to Buchwald, featured eight top-notch performances from a number of ethnic communities.

One of the first guests to give greetings was Darlene Dziewit, president of the Manitoba Federation of Labour, who said she had experienced "a transforming visit to Israel."

"It is important to see that in Manitoba, [unlike other provinces, where labour federations have supported boycotting Israel], people who identify with the left politically are also supporters of Israel," Melnick said.

NDP member of Parliament Judy Wasylycia-Leis, (Winnipeg-North) gave greetings and said how exciting it was for her to be in Israel in May for its 60th anniversary celebrations. She noted that Pat Martin, another NDP MP (for Winnipeg Centre) was present at the event.

Christine Melnick cuts the cake.

The first half of the Shared Values concert featured the music of Hinode Taiko, a drumming group, as well as dances by the India School of Dance Music and Theatre, and the Rusalka Ukrainian Dance Ensemble.

Manitoba Justice Minister David Chomiak, who attended the event, said he is "a big supporter of Israel."

He added: "I was one of the Ukrainian kids who used to dance with Rusalka. I wasn't that good. I was in the back row."

The concert also featured an amazing hoop dance by First Nations dancer Brian Cline, accompanied with vocals and drums by Ray Stevensen. Cline was introduced by former Assembly of First Nations chief Ovid Mercredi, from the Grand Rapids First nations, who has also been to Israel several times on missions with the Jewish National Fund.

About 200 members of First Nations communities from northern Manitoba, Northern Ontario and Saskatchewan came to Winnipeg for the event.

"Many First Nations people have a real connection to Israel because of the things that we [the First Nations and the Jewish People have] suffered. Israelis have a love for the land and we also have a love for the land," said Linda Mavsilar, a Christian member of a First Nations community in Saskatchewan.

"It is our intention to grow the Manitoba-Israel Shared Values Roundtable, and attract members of different faiths and communities," said Sharon Blady, an NDP MLA for Kirkfield Park.

Andrew Swan, the province's minister of competitiveness, training and trade, also gave greetings and said that Manitoba, can learn a lot from Israel's experience "of being able to take in one million immigrants from the former Soviet Union."

The second half of the concert featured the Brazilian music of Viva Capoeira, the dancing of Magdaragat Phillipines Inc., and a spirited performance by Evans Coffie, a West African dancer, singer and percussionist who invited members of the audience to join him in dance. The concert ended with a performance by the city's Chai Folk Ensemble, North America's oldest and largest Israeli folk dance ensemble.

Richard Buchwald and Jonathan Kroft, president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, both paid tribute to Harold Buchwald.

"My father always brought people together for the common purpose of Israel," Buchwald said.

Afterward, the audience, most of whom consisted of members from the general community, were invited to have a slice of a large birthday cake with the Manitoba and Israeli flags on it.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

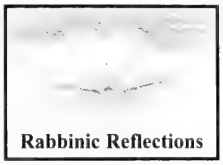
What Yom Kippur can and can't do

By RABBI MARTIN BERMAN



Our rabbis explained in the following Mishna how they understood Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement.

"If a person said: 'I will sin and repent, sin and repent,' he will be given no chance to repent. If he said, 'I will sin and the Day of Atonement will effect atonement,' then the Day of Atonement effects no atonement. For transgressions that are between a person and God the Day of Atonement effects atonement, but for transgressions that are between one person and another, the Day of Atonement effects atonement only if he has appeased the other."

Let's consider the parts of this Mishna in turn.

"If a person said: 'I will sin and repent, sin and repent,' he will be given no chance to repent." When a person creates a way of life for himself or herself, it's very difficult to alter that life. We become used to how we do things. Our habits become ingrained in our lives and we find it difficult to change.

A second problem is that we become inured to our shortcomings, and so later in life, even major ones are ignored. We tell little lies to protect ourselves from embarrassment, and we find that lying becomes easier than telling the truth. We say that we want to change, but we do not really want to alter the way we do things.

"If he said, 'I will sin and the Day of Atonement will effect atonement,' then the Day of Atonement effects no atonement." One cannot lead a life devoid of morality and then expect one day of the year to make up for it. Yom Kippur is not an instant, foolproof salvation day. The rabbis felt that Yom Kippur could only bring atonement for those who truly repent. A person who sins thinking that Yom Kippur will save him cannot be truly penitent. Sincere regret is necessary for atonement. The person who thinks he can use Yom Kippur is incapable of sincere repentance.

When we don't truly recognize that what we are doing is wrong, when we only give lip service to saying that it is a sin – that is, a mistake that we must correct – we won't change, because we don't really believe in our heart that we have to change.

"For transgressions that are between a person and God, the Day of Atonement effects atonement, but for transgressions that are between one person and another, the Day of Atonement effects atonement only if he has appeased the other." There are two types of sins: ben adam l'makom, between a person and God, and ben adam l'chavero, between two people. When one sins against God, He has the right to forgive, since He is the injured party.

But when one sins against another human being, a person has to make amends to both the person as well as to God. God has no right to forgive before we have appeased the innocent party. That's why there is a custom to visit with acquaintances during this time of year and seek forgiveness for any injuries we may have committed.

From this Mishna, we can see what our duty is on Yom Kippur. We must attempt to create a change in ourselves so that we are no longer inured to our own misdeeds. We must not regard Yom Kippur as an escape clause that allows us to lead immoral lives. Finally, we must seek the forgiveness of both people and God in order to gain atonement for our sins.

As Rabbi Israel Meir Kagan, the Chofetz Chaim, explained in regard to the custom of beating the heart when we recite the confession of our sins: "God does not forgive the sins of one who smites his heart, but He pardons those whose hearts smite them for their sins."

May our hearts stir in us the remorse for our sins that will make Yom Kippur truly a day of atonement.

Rabbi Martin Berman is spiritual leader of Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill, Ont.

Rachamim from God

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As Yom Kippur comes again, we naturally back away from confronting the issues of the day, questions of destiny, security, life and death – all of the serious life-changing decisions that we believe are finalized on Yom Kippur.

We stand in honest starkness before the Creator, knowing that whether or not we admit our shortcomings, they are known and assessed, and we are accountable. Admitting them helps us grow, but in truth, we know that nothing can be hidden.

And so on Yom Kippur, we become vulnerable. Toward the end of the day, we feel the effects of our fasting. We feel weakened and usually fight a dehydration headache. The truth of our human vulnerability stands before us, perhaps a little too starkly. With all of the future physical realities at stake – life, food, water, health and wealth, just to name a few – our spirituality is appealing to another reality of the day.

Over and over again in the prayers of the High Holidays, we appeal to God to treat us with mercy. One of the words for mercy that repeats in our prayers is rachamim. We entreat God to approach us with a measure of rachamim, mercy, and not strict justice.

Hebrew is rich with words that mean "mercy," but women understand the power of the word rachamim. Based on the Hebrew root rechem, meaning womb, the word rachamim speaks of a particular kind of mercy, the kind that generates in the womb.

This kind of mercy is what bonds a pregnant woman to her unborn child. The child is "guilty" of all kinds of discomforts to the mother, including sleeplessness, indigestion, fatigue, nausea, and the list goes on. And yet, all of this is tolerated and borne by the woman carrying the child, because the relationship that is being cemented withstands it all.

Throughout life, the child will continue to experience free will on a trial-and-error basis. Mistakes will be made, and foolish decisions and actions will be repeated as the child grows and tries to figure everything out. The parent will continue to feel compassion toward the child in a way that no one else will share and that is never assessed on whether it is deserved or not. As much as our minds will tell us that the child has done wrong, our hearts are melted by the tears of our children.

We approach Yom Kippur with our heartfelt and honest presentation of who we are as children to our Divine Parent. We stand frightened of the future, just as a child stands before the parent, frightened and insecure.

We emphasize the need for rachamim, the kind of compassion that is the bond between parent and child.

Rabbi Eleazar states in the Talmud that since the Temple was destroyed, the Gates of Prayer are closed. But although the Gates of Prayer remain closed, the Gate of Tears is forever open.

The development of the alphabet

By ALEX GROPPER

The alphabet is one of the great advances in the intellectual history of mankind. It took the concept of writing a giant leap forward by tremendously reducing the number of symbols that had been used in earlier scripts. Its impact on the spread of knowledge is analogous to that of the computer in the last few decades. Archeology has revealed much about this fascinating process.

Past Forward

It was in the ancient Near East that writing was first developed some 5,000 years ago, circa 3300 BCE, sometime around the dawn of civilization. In fact writing is an important component in the definition of civilization, according to most scholars. But the earliest scripts, notably cuneiform in Mesopotamia and hieroglyphs in Egypt, were composed of many symbols and required a long time to master.

Only a few people were able to master this complex system. Knowledge and its transmission were limited to a powerful elite. As a result, the scribe occupied an important position in these early societies. In ancient Egypt, we have statues of scribes dating as far back as the Old Kingdom in the third millennium BCE.

It was in the latter part of the Bronze Age (circa 3200-1200 BCE) that writing underwent a major transformation with the invention of the alphabet, which some have traced back as early as the Middle Bronze Age (circa 2000-1500 BCE). There is evidence that an early alphabetic script was first used in Egypt circa 1800 BCE.

However, in 1916 Alan Gardiner, the eminent Egyptologist, discovered a script dating to the middle of the second millennium BCE in the copper mines of the Sinai, in which Canaanite slaves had worked. It is they who are thought to have devised this new and revolutionary method of writing whose ramifications would be earth shattering.

The fall of the Bronze Age brought about the spread and modification of the new script in the new city states and national monarchies that sprang up in the no man's land between the great empires of the Bronze Age, in Egypt and Mesopotamia. The Phoenician city-states, along the littoral of the eastern Mediterranean, and the kingdom of Israel are primary examples of this political phenomenon.

These states both used and spread the alphabet. At Isbet Sarta (Aphek) in coastal Israel, archeologists have found alphabetic scribbles dating to 11th century BCE. At ancient Raddana, near modern Ramallah, letters have been discovered that were inscribed on arrowheads that date a century earlier. This was around the time when Israel was beginning to coalesce into a state, first under the Judges and then under the monarchy. It was under the monarchy that court historians would use the alphabet in writing the histories that would ultimately come down to us as part of the Bible.

This was also the time that the Phoenicians were embarking on their epic voyages across the Mediterranean, first to Cyprus in the 11th century BCE and then as far as Spain by the eighth century BCE. Ultimately, the Phoenicians were the catalysts in spreading this new method of writing to places such as Greece, where Homer would use it to write his classic epics. Archeologists have found Phoenician inscriptions throughout the Mediterranean – in Italy, North Africa and Sardinia.

It was our Bible that was the high point of alphabetic writing. The great Harvard scholar Frank Moore Cross told me that the Bible and the development of the alphabet went hand in hand. And the zenith of the Bible is considered by many scholars to be the Prophets and their message. It was the first time in history that a coherent message of universal morality and truth went hand in hand. Despite the destruction of Jerusalem and the monarchy, that message would endure and become the cornerstone of western civilization.

The Yizkor service

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It is one of the most solemn moments of the Yom Kippur service – and the entire Jewish calendar. The chazzan and the entire congregation rise to recite Yizkor and commemorate the memories of parents, family and friends who have passed away. To help bring meaning and understanding to the Yizkor service, here are some valuable resources available on the web.

The Jewish Highway

Yizkor, which means "he shall remember," was originally only recited on Yom HaKippurim, which literally means the "Day of Atonements." The Orthodox Union site points out that this phrase is in the plural and refers to the Atonement for the Living and Atonement for the Dead. [tinyurl.com/yizkor04] Chancellor Ismar Schorsch of the Jewish Theological Seminary explains how this memorial prayer has also become associated with Shemini Atzeret, Passover and Shavuot. [tinyurl. com/yizkor06]

There are many websites that do a good job of presenting the text of the prayer, but I think the best is ORT's Yizkor Online Memorial. [yizkor. ort.org] The prayer is presented in the original Hebrew, in English, and in an English transliteration for people who need a bit of assistance. If you need a bit more help, click on the link and listen to Yizkor [tinyurl.com/yizkor03] and the K'El Maleh Rachamim prayers being recited. [tinyurl.com/kelmaleh]

Many congregations have adopted the practice of reciting versions of K'El Maleh Rachamim to remember victims of the Holocaust – "for the souls of the holy and pure ones/ who were killed, murdered, slaughtered, burned, drowned, and strangled/ for the sanctification of the Name" – and to honour the memory of the men and women who have given their lives in defence of Israel.

Since many prayer books do not include both these prayers or contain varying texts, you may want to print the version found at this site and distribute copies in your synagogue or temple. The Orthodox Union's Yizkor Section has another very good version of all these prayers. [tinyurl.com/yizkor05]

Who should stay in the room while Yizkor is being recited? How soon after the death of a relative should the prayer be said? You can find answers to questions about Yizkor customs and traditions at My Jewish Learning. [tinyurl. com/yizkor09] (Remember to check with your own rabbi for your community's traditions.)

Sephardi Jews do not share the same Yizkor tradition and liturgy. [tinyurl. com/hashkava] Hashkavot are recited on the anniversary of a death and on Yom Kippur for members of the community who have died during the past year. [sgula.org/tefilot]

Although not associated with the Yizkor service, Yizkor books merit a mention. These are books usually written in Hebrew or Yiddish that catalogue the lives and the communities destroyed during the Holocaust. The New York Public Library has photographed and put online 650 Yizkor books [tinyurl. com/yizkor08], and JewishGen.org, the exceptional Jewish geneological site, has translated some of them into English. [jewishgen.org/yizkor]

One tradition that has become inextricably connected to remembering a loved one is the lighting of a candle. Rabbi Rafi Rank answers common questions surrounding the practice. [tinyurl. com/yizcandle] Rabbi Goldie Milgram suggests that aside from just lighting a candle, this is the ideal time to involve children in remembering a relative who has passed away. After lighting the candle, she recommends passing around a photo of the person being remembered. Then share a story about that person's life and his/her meaning in your own life. [rebgoldie. com/yizkor.htm]

In Yizkor for the Living, Stewart Gisser writes that when he recited the prayer, he not only remembered the gentle, loving, kind man who was his father. He also thanked God for his mother, alive and well. [tinyurl. com/yizkor02]

"During Yizkor, I remembered. I thought, have I told her that I will prove myself worthy of the gifts with which she blessed me?… Perhaps there should be another service, immediately after. A short service. Everyone who left comes back to sit with their parents, to say prayers of thanksgiving. They can be thankful that they didn't have to stay for the memorial prayers, and can remember those still living who enrich their lives."

Canadian students protest against Iranian leader

By CARA STERN
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK— A large group of Canadian students showed their disapproval of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad at a Sept. 22 rally in New York City.

The Canadians were among thousands protesting at Dag Hammarskjold Plaza against Ahmadinejad's presence at the United Nations, where the Iranian leader was scheduled to speak the following day.

The trip was organized by the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS), National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL), and Students Helping Others Understand Tolerance (SHOUT).

Dan Schloss, advocacy co-ordinator for Hillel Ottawa, estimated that 150 students from Ottawa, Toronto, Kingston and Montreal travelled to New York to take part in the rally against Ahmadinejad, who has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction and whose country is said to be developing nuclear weapons.

The students had various reasons why they thought the protest was important.

"There were a lot of issues, but primarily we were concerned with protesting the plight of other human beings," said Shima Vigodda, a third-year student at the University of Ottawa.

"This isn't just an Israeli-Iranian issue. There are larger dimensions and larger implications."

"There's the possibility that [Canadian values] can be shifted silently without anybody knowing it," said Amy Gill, a second-year master's student at the University of Ottawa.

"If you don't participate... things can change around you without your control."

Stand With Us, an Israeli advocacy group, invited Micah Halpern, an analyst and expert on terrorism, to speak to the Canadian students. He explained the current situation in Iran, and why the rally was an important step.

"The reality is that [the rally is] not going to have a huge impact on Iran," he said. "It's going to have a huge impact on the nations which you're coming from, western nations, which need to always stand up against evil."

The rally began with Hebrew music, though many people in the crowd were not Jewish or Israeli. People danced and sang along, while countless people filled the plaza.

The speakers constantly led chants, urging the United Nations to "stop Iran now."

Many of the speakers discussed the importance of separating Ahmadinejad from the Iranian people, insisting that the protest was against the president and the Iranian regime, not the country and its citizens.

Across the street, outside of the plaza, a group of Iranians were protesting the living conditions for Iranian citizens as a result of Ahmadinejad's rule.

Holocaust survivor and Nobel Laureate Elie Wiesel spoke at the rally, urging "all the delegations at the United Nations across the street to leave the hall the moment he appears on stage."

Wiesel said that Ahmadinejad is an "arch-criminal" who wants to follow Adolf Hitler's footsteps by planning a nuclear Holocaust.

"Civilized people everywhere must join forces to oppose his visions of destruction," he said.

"His place is not here [in New York], but in Europe, in Holland, in a UN prison cell."

Ilana Chriqui, a first-year law student at the University of Montreal who is also co-president of Centre Hillel, the Montreal association for French Jewish students, spoke of a group of 20 Iranian students who are being held in prison for their association with an organization called Students for Freedom and Equality.

"All these students are now in prison, where they might be tortured or otherwise ill treated," she said, concluding with a list of names of 10 of the prisoners.

A small group from Neturei Karta International, an organization of haredi Jews who oppose Zionism, also protested near the rally. The messages on their signs said Jews should not support Israel, because the group believes that Zionism contradicts Jewish tenets about the coming of the Messiah.

They held signs with messages such as, "The Iranian president respects Judaism, disrespects Zionism."

Although the organized parts of the rally were nonpartisan, some protesters were unhappy that Democratic Senator Hillary Clinton of New York and Republican vice-presidential nominee Sarah Palin were not present.

The previous week, an invitation to Palin to appear was withdrawn two days after Clinton cancelled longstanding plans to address the rally after she learned that Palin was invited.

Many signs showed support for the Republican party, while others focused on Clinton's decision not to attend.

"It was a little disappointing that politics got dragged into it," said Joshua Zelikovitz, president of Hillel at Queen's University, "but I was very impressed with the rest of it."

Yakov Fruchter, the director of Jewish leadership development for NJCL, said the educational aspect of the trip "ultimately will lead young people to have the knowledge and information to stand up and speak up more often."

He said he hopes students will be inspired by their experience in New York, and continue to be active in trying to end the situation in Iran.

"My expectation is that nobody takes this as an isolated event," he said, adding that often people need one experience to motivate them to become active and involved in the Jewish community.

Gissin brings rebranding discussion to York

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Amir Gissin wasn't surprised at how few students came to hear him speak at York University last week – indeed, it proved to him that Israel has a problem with its public image.

Fifteen students heard Gissin, Israel's consul general in Toronto, speak Sept. 22 about the "Brand Israel" pilot project now underway in Toronto, and its possible relevance for students.

"One reason this hall isn't filled is that it seems we can't win," Gissin said. "There is a negative atmosphere here, and at other campuses. I offer you a framework of winning the [public relations] war. It might sound ambitious, but I want to share my optimism."

The Israeli government has partnered with Jewish community organizations in Toronto to launch the "Brand Israel" program, a media and advertising campaign that aims to take the emphasis off the Middle East conflict and place it more on Israel's accomplishments and culture.

The Israel campus advocacy group Hasbara, which organized the event, moved the talk from York's Founders Assembly Hall to the Accolade East Building at the last minute due to what were described as security concerns.

Gissin maintained that while the public might know a lot about Israel, what it knows is heavily biased.

"It's not that our audience is ignorant. They feel they know too much. What they get about Israel are the same words, pictures and messages. The western media narrative is the poor Palestinians, Israeli tanks and Israeli guns. We've been portrayed that way for years," he said.

"The world believes that Israel's violence is the violence typical of extremist regimes. We must present Israel as a moderate state. It is the first step to a better image."

The branding project will try to shift the focus and associations about Israel from the conflict to what the country excels at.

"How are Israelis when we are at our best? Israel is the most creative place in the world, with entrepreneurship, ingenuity and a volcano of creativity. Your laptop even has a Jewish mind. There is likely an Israeli microchip in there."

Some York students in attendance liked what Gissin had to say.

Jessica Abourmad, 19, a linguistics major, said she agreed that the media's portrayal of the Jewish state should be less concerned with hostilities.

"I like the aspect that the goal is to focus more on people than what happens in the region. Automatically people think of disaster and murder when it comes to Israel," she said.

Hayley Ulrich, 20, an education and sociology major, believes that it's just as important to take the message to her peers on campus as it is to change Israel's media image.

"The reason people don't know about what good Israel has to offer is that the right image of Israel hasn't been put out there," she said.

Anna Neuman, 21 – a history and education major at York, as well as a Stand With Us Emerson Fellow and has been involved with Israel advocacy on campus for two years – said it's also worthwhile to sell Israel as a destination for university-aged tourists.

"These are students who go on spring break and winter break and are looking for travel destinations. They have disposable income. Israel has history, archeology, natural resources. It is so imperative for students to see what Israeli culture is really about," Neuman said.

The students at York's Hasbara are planning two major upcoming events. Shachar Zahavi, director of IsraAid, will speak at York on Oct. 2. IsraAid is an umbrella organization that brings together several Israeli humanitarian foundations.

As well, Hasbara is planning the second instalment of the annual Sing for Koby charity coffeehouse showcase in support of Camp Koby, on the evening of Oct. 19 (location to be announced).

Rock violinist aims to empower his audience

By SHLOMIT KRIGER
Special to The CJN

It isn't fame or money that fuels the passion of 30-year-old rock violinist Dan David. He hopes his music will help spread positive messages and make a difference in others' lives.

"I want to bring hope to people, to make them happy and empower them," said David, a.k.a. Dan David Aronovich.

David's love of music began at age seven, when he found himself drawn to the violin and enjoyed using it to express himself. He later took piano and drums lessons, but he doesn't play those instruments professionally.

Having spent 10 years of his childhood in Israel before moving to Montreal with his family in 1988, David went on to complete the music in performance program at McGill University, where, as a soloist for the McGill Chamber Orchestra, he often performed at prestigious sold-out concert halls around the city and the West Island.

While in university, he began writing some of his own songs. By his graduation, he had already composed more than 10.

"I felt that the songs came through me from a higher spirit," said David. "Being Jewish and believing in God, I felt that this was what I was meant to do."

David moved to Toronto in 1998 to continue pursuing his career as a musician. However, to have something to fall back on, he studied business at York University, thinking he'd become an accountant.

He realized a business degree wasn't necessary, though, since a year after he came to Toronto, BMG Music (now Sony BMG) offered him major publishing deals. But David didn't feel that they were right for his music and also didn't have any representation to protect his rights at the time.

"I keep thinking, 'Wow, I was only 21 then,'" said David. "But people can make mistakes signing contracts like that at a young age. I'm glad I didn't do it, because there have been bigger openings now and I can properly consider them."

David quit his university program and spent more time on songwriting and recording. He found the process of songwriting therapeutic. For a day job, he taught the violin.

David reflected on the challenges he faced growing up in a Conservative Jewish family.

He said that he had many conflicts with his parents as they had differing viewpoints on career paths and more. This is despite the fact that talent for music runs in his family and his mother, Asia, is a professional pianist for the National Ballet of Canada.

Meanwhile, he was struggling to make it in his field in general and not be affected by people trying to put him down or rob him of his dreams.

"I started searching for answers from God and other things," he said. "It was like searching for inner peace, and creating the songs was a very spiritual process."

David's first major professional performance came in 2000 when he was asked to accompany Persian pop diva Googoosh at her concert for 13,000 fans at the Air Canada Centre. He performed with her again the following year, and both concerts were released on DVD.

In July 2004, David released his first album, The Right Place. Following its local success, he got signed with DMI Records.

Later that year, a mutual friend introduced David to vocalist David J (a.k.a. Roberts). The two decided to collaborate and soon formed the Dan David Band.

The band went on to play at sold-out concerts and at private functions such as weddings and corporate events across the province and in the United States.

Continuing to teach on the side, David created a method book published in early 2006 called Violin Made Easy, which includes more than 30 of his original compositions and has been successful worldwide.

The new album gave his band a higher profile and has led to larger gigs. Apart from performing for fundraisers and political campaigns, the band played for the audience of the hit television show Are You Smarter Than a Canadian 5th Grader?

Earlier this year, the Dan David Band appeared on Daystar Television, joining renowned American singer Marty Goetz for a song and playing for an audience of about 250 million across the United States and Europe.

"I love performing and feel great energy from the audience," said David. "I could be on the stage all day.

"In every performance that my band does, we want to share a story with the audience, and I really believe that the music inspires people."

Also working on music for films, David has recorded multiple violin tracks for The Story of Lydia. Released under Backstage Productions International, the film was inspired by the true story of Lydia Christensen Prince, a Danish schoolteacher who moved to Jerusalem in the early 1900s and started the first orphanage for Jewish and Arabic children and over the years adopted eight children.

The Dan David Band is currently considering offers from major labels as it wants to get its music released worldwide and to tour internationally.

"I'm not happy enough yet with where I'm at in my career," said David. "I would never pursue a music career just to get to perform for people. I find that doesn't have enough meaning to it, and it eventually becomes just a job like any other.

"I always felt that I had to do something big with it. I haven't inspired as many people as I want to."

Dan David's website address is www.dandavidmusic.com.

Unwilling to give up on his dream of making it as a musician, David "started searching for answers from God" and for "inner peace."

The Dan David Band released a second CD, There's Peace, in December 2007. David said that apart from reflecting his own personal growth, all of his songs have some Jewish connection. For example, the song Free relates to soldiers returning home, while There's Peace is about believing in God and finding inner peace.

Israel must quit eastern Jerusalem and Golan, Olmert says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Outgoing Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said in remarks published Monday that Israel would have to withdraw from eastern Jerusalem and the Golan Heights if it is serious about making peace with the Palestinians and Syria.

Olmert said in an interview with Yedioth Aharonoth that as a hard-line politician for decades, he had not been prepared to look at reality in all of its depth.

"Ariel Sharon spoke about painful costs and refused to elaborate," Olmert told the daily. "I say, we have no choice but to elaborate. At the end of the day, we will have to withdraw from the most decisive areas of the territories. In exchange for the same territories left in our hands, we will have to give compensation in the form of territories within the State of Israel.

"I think we are very close to an agreement," Olmert added.

These comments were the clearest sign to date of Olmert's willingness to meet key Palestinian demands in peace talks.

On the Syria track, Olmert said a future peace agreement requires a pullout from the Golan Heights, an area under Israeli control since the 1967 Six Day War.

"First and foremost, we must make a decision. I'd like see if there is one serious person in the State of Israel who believes it is possible to make peace with the Syrians without eventually giving up the Golan Heights.

"It is true that an agreement with Syria comes with danger," he said. "Those who want to act with zero danger should move to Switzerland."

Yedioth Aharonoth noted that in this "legacy interview," published on the eve of the Jewish New Year, Olmert went further in making offers for peace than he ever did publicly when he was in active office and had greater power to see them carried out.

Western and Palestinian officials say that in peace talks with the Palestinians, Olmert has proposed an Israeli withdrawal from some 93 per cent of the West Bank, in addition to all of the Gaza Strip, which Israel pulled out of in 2005.

The negotiations, which Olmert has vowed to continue until he leaves office when a new government is formed, have shown few signs of progress, and both sides acknowledge that chances of meeting Washington's target of a deal by the end of the year are slim.

Olmert has also engaged Syria in indirect negotiations through Turkish mediation, but has not remarked publicly on the scope of an Israeli pullout from the Golan Heights.

He has said repeatedly that Israel intends to keep major Jewish settlement blocs in the West Bank in any future peace deal with the Palestinians.

A peace agreement, Olmert has said, would mean Israel would have to compensate the Palestinians for the land it hopes to retain by a "close to a one-to-one ratio."

In exchange for the settlement enclaves, Olmert has proposed about a five per cent land swap giving the Palestinians a desert territory adjacent to the Gaza Strip, as well as land on which to build a transit corridor between Gaza and the West Bank.

He has so far put off negotiations on sharing Jerusalem and ruled out a so-called "right of return" for Palestinian refugees, a central Palestinian demand. On both issues, there is strong opposition in Israel to significant concessions.

Barak is key to Livni coalition

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

With her Kadima party primary victory, prime minister-designate Tzipi Livni now has five more weeks to form a government and stave off new elections. Theoretically, if she cannot form a government, President Shimon Peres could give someone else a chance before calling an election.

But there is no other viable candidate.

Analysis

The Likud party's Benjamin Netanyahu wouldn't consider such an offer because he prefers new elections. Polls show elections would deliver Netanyahu more than twice the number of seats Likud commands in the present Knesset.

The Labor party's Ehud Barak is not eligible because he is not a member of the Knesset.

Whether the country is headed for an early election should become clear fairly soon.

Livni says she does not intend to be dragged into a long coalition-building process. If in about 10 days she believes the chances of forming a government are not high, she says she will lead a move for new elections herself.

Despite all the obstacles and the recalcitrance of some of her prospective coalition partners, however, Livni is far more likely to succeed in forming a government than to fail.

Much will depend on the enigmatic Barak.

On the day Livni replaced Prime Minister Ehud Olmert as Kadima party leader, Barak shocked the political establishment by meeting with Netanyahu and declaring that he would only join a national emergency government if it included the Likud leader.

It was a double-edged ploy by Barak: put the onus of blame for not joining a national unity effort on Netanyahu, whom Barak knew would refuse, and create the impression in Livni's mind that he has an option of continuing to serve as defence minister in a Netanyahu government after elections and thereby upping the price for joining her coalition.

Barak's manoeuvring stems from the dilemma he faces: if he joins a coalition, he helps the untried Livni establish herself as a credible national leader; if he stays out, he risks taking a hammering in early elections. His biggest fear is that Livni will use him to form a government and in three months or so, on a wave of popular acclaim, precipitate a national election.

Barak's solution seems to be a readiness to join the coalition on two conditions: one, redefining the balance of power between him and Livni to create what he calls a "true partnership." Two, a guarantee from Livni that as far as she is concerned, the government will hold together for the full two years, until the next scheduled election in 2010.

Barak hopes to create the perception of a two-headed Livni-Barak government from which he, too, will emerge two years down the road as a serious candidate for prime minister. Indeed, all of Barak's current coalition jockeying is about the 2010 elections.

Livni was quick to address Barak's concerns. In her speech accepting her nomination as prime minister-designate, she appealed to Netanyahu to join a national unity government, spoke of a "true partnership" with Labor and promised that her government would be for the long term.

Barak phoned Livni to congratulate her on her speech, and senior Labor politicians now estimate the chances of a Kadima-Labor agreement are high.

On paper, Livni has three broad coalition options.

(1) A "national emergency" government including Labor and Likud. The argument for this is that Israel faces looming crises on several fronts and needs a unified Kadima-Labor-Likud leadership to meet them. The emergency government would be for a set time – a year, for example – with an agreed-upon date for new elections. Barak would stay on as defence minister and Netanyahu would be offered the Foreign Ministry or the Treasury. Livni would not need Shas, which is pressing for budget-sapping child allowances.

But Netanyahu thus far has refused even to consider the idea. Despite Livni's public call and the fact that Netanyahu could be blamed for subverting national unity in a time of crisis, the Likud leader is unlikely to change his mind.

Security Council reaffirms existing sanctions against Iran

"It is deeply disastrous to witness that some presidential nominees have to visit these people, take part in their gatherings, and swear their allegiance and commitment to their interests in order to win financial or media support," Ahmadinejad said.

"These nations are spending their dignity and resources on the crimes and threats of the Zionist network against their will."

Ahmadinejad said the "Zionist regime" is on the path to collapse and that a messianic age of peace and brotherhood is soon to arrive.

He also sounded a defiant note with respect to his country's nuclear program, which he described as peaceful, but which western nations suspect is pursuing weapons capability. Ahmadinejad said having nuclear power is his country's "inalienable" right and accused "a few bullying powers" of opposing Iran's progress.

"It is very natural that the great Iranian people, with their trust in God, and with determination and steadfastness, and with the support of its friends, will resist the bullying and will continue to defend its rights," he said. "We will not accept illegal demands."

Ahmadinejad also included the "underhanded actions of the Zionists" as among the causes of the recent unrest in the former Soviet republic of Georgia.

In an interview with the Los Angeles Times published Tuesday, Ahmadinejad said Israel's demise would benefit everyone, especially the United States.

"The regime resembles an airplane that has lost its engine and is kind of going down. And no one can help it," he said. "This will benefit everyone."

Still, Iran says its uranium-enrichment program is for civilian purposes only, including electricity generation, although it is currently under IAEA investigation and has been hit with UN sanctions over past undeclared activity and failure to prove its intentions are wholly peaceful.

The UN Security Council last weekend passed a resolution reaffirming existing sanctions against Iran, but did not expand them.

The resolution, adopted unanimously Saturday, called on "Iran to comply fully and without delay" with three earlier resolutions imposing sanctions until Iran co-operates fully with UN nuclear inspectors.

Sanctions passed in the last year-and-a-half ban most types of uranium enrichment dealings with Iran, freeze some Iranian assets overseas, ban travel by Iranian individuals suspected of involvement in Iran's alleged nuclear program, monitor Iran's financial institutions and impose inspections of Iranian cargo.

Israel and western nations want to expand the sanctions to include actual bans on financial institutions and the export of refined petroleum to Iran. That won't happen without the support of China and Russia, two of the five permanent members of the Security Council that have veto power. The failure to expand the sanctions is, in part, a result of recent U.S.-Russia tensions stemming from Russia's invasion of Georgia last month.

Israel, however, commended the resolution: "Today's UN Security Council resolution re-emphasizes the severity of the threat emanating from Iran's nuclear program to world peace and reiterates the urgency of applying drastic and effective international sanctions," said a statement issued by Sallai Meridor, the Israeli envoy to Washington.

In related developments, Iran is on its way to mastering technology that would enable it to build atomic bombs, International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) director Mohamed ElBaradei said in remarks published Friday.

ElBaradei said that having nuclear arms unfortunately still symbolizes prestige and power, tempting nations with security worries to at least develop the potential for a bomb through the "dual use" enrichment process.

There are currently seven countries confirmed to have nuclear weapons, and a wide range of countries with access to the components – fissile material or the equipment to produce it – that could give them an atomic bomb "in a matter of months or a year," ElBaradei said.

Asked by Germany's Sueddeutsche Zeitung daily if Iran is also on its way to "virtual" nuclear-weapons power status, he said, "That is correct." But he added that Tehran could not "break out" to a bomb as long as IAEA monitors remained at its nuclear sites.

Iran has pledged to maintain regular IAEA inspections which are limited to only a few declared facilities.

"They have the cookbook… [But] right now they don't yet have the ingredients – enough nuclear material to make a bomb overnight," ElBaradei said.

He did not say how long Iran might need to reach that threshold, if indeed that is its goal. Some western analysts say this could come within two years.

"The hope is that as long as such countries remain in the NPT [Non-Proliferation Treaty] with IAEA inspectors keeping watch, the likelihood is slim [that they] would risk international isolation if they quit the treaty," ElBaradei said.

There has been talk in the United States and Israel of last resort military action against Iranian nuclear sites, although each remains formally committed to a diplomatic solution.

ElBaradei said the military option would be disastrous and the Iranian issue could not be resolved unless Washington dropped its refusal to negotiate with Tehran directly and without preconditions.

"The Iranian issue at its heart is really a question of security…The nuclear [part] is a symptom of an underlying sense of insecurity or a desire to be recognized as a major, regional power," ElBaradei told Sueddeutsche Zeitung.

"Europe is not really in the front seat. It is the U.S. who is in the front seat. The earlier that you have a direct negotiation between the U.S. and Iran, the earlier the prospect that we will have a solution," he said.

A settlement would have to address security issues across the region including the Israeli-Palestinian peace process and "the elephant in the room" – Israel's undeclared nuclear arsenal, ElBaradei said.

"A military solution… will give [Iran's] regime the full [domestic] support, the full justification to go for a crash course to develop nuclear weapons. The know-how is there – you cannot take it out of their minds.

"They will simply, in my view, go underground. The region is already in an unsustainable situation, and adding an attack will simply create a ball of fire which will ricochet everywhere, in every part of the world," he said.

'This visit was extremely moving'

He said Israel provides an example of support for entrepreneurship and the growth of enterprises.

One solid deal was announced before the mission's return to Quebec. The Israeli venture-capital company Vertex is investing $4 million in the Montreal-based communications technology firm Neuralitic, which was founded last year. The Quebec Federation of Labour's Fonds de la solidarité, was represented on the mission by vice-president Jacques Bernier, which invests in Vertex.

The Quebec delegation met with many Israeli business and government officials, including Bank of Israel governor Stanley Fischer. They visited a number of startup companies and research institutes, including Hadassit, the technology transfer company of the Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem. Bachand was impressed by its success in developing and commercializing the results of its medical research. He also toured the Technion institute of technology in Haifa.

Bachand praised the "creativity, audacity and competence" of Israeli entrepreneurs. He noted that Israel is a world leader in spending on research and development. He made a special pitch to Israeli venture capitalists about the bustling high-tech scene in Montreal.

"Quebec must not only maintain, but also increase its relations and collaboration with this country whose expertise is diverse and amazing," said Bachand, who worked in the private sector most of his life, mainly as an executive of the Métro-Richelieu grocery chain.

He would also like to increase scientific partnerships between Quebec and Israeli institutions. He cited such existing relationships as the joint research into muscular dystrophy between the Centre hospitalier de l'Université de Laval and Hadassah Hospital, and the McGill University Cancer Centre and the Weizmann Institute's M.D. Moross Institute for Cancer Research.

Bachand visited Ramallah on the West Bank, where he met Hassan Abu-Libdeh, an adviser to the Palestinian prime minister, toured a pharmaceutical firm and attended a dinner hosted by Ramallah Mayor Janet Michael.

He also visited two storefront community centres, established by the McGill University Middle East Peace Program, in east and west Jerusalem, as well as an affiliated food co-operative in Gilo. The Quebec government gives a $50,000 annual grant to the MMEP.

Upon his arrival in Israel from Russia, Bachand insisted on going to Yad Vashem, the Holocaust remembrance authority, where he spent almost three hours, said D'Arcy McGee MNA Lawrence Bergman, who accompanied Bachand, along with lawyer Eric Maldoff, president of the Quebec-Israel Committee.

"This visit was extremely moving, and we were made to understand the complete horror of this dramatic episode in history and its six million victims," Bachand said. "It was all the more [moving] because there are still numerous Holocaust survivors among our fellow Quebec citizens."

Bachand laid a wreath on behalf of the Quebec government in the commemorative hall. He then visited the museum and was particularly struck by the children's memorial.

"It was important for me to go to Yad Vashem to meditate in this place and to show the full sympathy of the Quebec people for this great tragedy."

He then visited the Israel Museum to see the Dead Sea Scrolls exhibition and then visited the Western Wall.

The Quebecers also visited the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot and the Hebrew University's technology transfer company, Yissum. Bachand also personally met chief scientist Eli Opper of the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor.

A total of 100 private meetings were held by the 40 delegates with Israeli businesspeople and researchers.

One of them, André Blain, president of Pharma Laser, commented: "This mission was profitable for me and my company. I could identify many potential customers and become familiar with the local business realities."

Bergman described the mission as a complete success, and called it unprecedented in its size and scope. In 1997, Parti Québécois minister Sylvain Simard also visited Israel and concluded an entente, but did not lead a delegation like this.

"There was a lot of electricity in the air," Bergman said. "It was positive at the political and personal level: There was an excellent chemistry between Mr. Yishai and Mr. Bachand. This was not just a formality."

Bergman believes the delegates also profited from the experience. "Many contacts were made. I didn't hear anyone say it did not work out for them," said Bergman, who estimates that at least half had never been to Israel before.

"The signing of this agreement is yet another affirmation of our mutual desire to strengthen the existing synergy and bilateral relations between Israel and Quebec in areas such as high-tech, as well as science and development," said Israel consul general in Montreal, Yoram Elron.

"We are convinced this will lead to increased joint ventures and investments between our respective societies."

Israel is currently Quebec's fourth-largest trading partner in the Middle East, with exports totalling $96 million (US) and imports of $184 million last year.

Paul Newman dies after struggle with cancer

By URI KLEIN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli actor Haim Topol and the Iranian press were among those around the world to pay tribute Sunday to legendary actor Paul Newman.

A Newman spokesperson said memorial services for the actor, who died Sept. 26 at his farmhouse near Westport, Conn., of cancer at age 83, would be private.

Even conservative Muslim Iran, which would not usually concern itself with reporting on a western film star, marked his death. Two pro-reform newspapers displayed the actor on their front pages, while Iran's state media also reported his death.

The Etemad newspaper, published Newman's picture, saying "Fading away the last classic star" and the Kargozaran daily said "End of the blue-eyed boy."

Israeli actor Haim Topol, who Newman helped to set up the Hole-In-The-Wall camps for children with incurable diseases, called him a "dear human being."

"He busied himself with the professional rather than with PR," Topol told Israel Radio. "His main motto was, 'If you do not exploit your success in order to improve things in the world, then you are really wasting it.'"

Tributes came from Hollywood colleagues as well. Elizabeth Taylor, who co-starred with Newman in Cat on a Hot Tin Roof, offered emotional comments.

"I loved that man with all my heart. He was goodness and kindness and pure integrity," she said in a statement. "Knowing him, being his friend, was as golden as the sunset and a privilege I'll never forget."

Talking to TV reporters, daughter Lissy Newman encouraged people who wanted to pay tribute to simply show kindness to a friend, donate money to charity or vote in the U.S. elections.

"Just look out for each other. That's really what he was all about," Lissy Newman said. "He was awesome to the end, and he is an awesome guy, and his spirit will be with us forever and ever and ever."

Underlining Newman's broad appeal was the global response. Britain's Independent Sunday newspaper featured his photograph across the whole of page one, relegating the latest news of the country's banking woes to the inside pages.

"Paul Newman: Death of King Cool" ran the caption headline in the Sunday Times above a portrait of the heartthrob and philanthropist.

In Germany, as elsewhere, TV news channels have been showing clips from his films, and in France, President Nicolas Sarkozy hailed Newman as a "Hollywood legend."

"Actor, author, screenwriter, director, producer and philanthropist, he was also a great friend of France and fans of motor racing will remember his successive appearances at the Le Mans 24-hour race," Sarkozy said in a statement.

In Italy actress Sophia Loren, who appeared in the film Lady L with Newman, called the news "a blow."

"When such important personalities die, one despairs and thinks that, little by little, all the greats are disappearing," she told the Il Messaggero daily.

Paul Leonard Newman, known as "PL" to friends, appeared in more than 50 movies, including Cat on a Hot Tin Roof, Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid, The Sting and Slap Shot.

He earned nine Oscar nominations for acting and won the best actor award for 1986's The Color of Money.

A director and race car driver as well as an actor, Newman was also known for his extensive philanthropy. He created Newman's Own food products, which funneled more than $250 million in profits to thousands of charities worldwide.

Newman is survived by his wife of 50 years Joanne Woodward, five daughters, two grandsons, and his older brother, Arthur. Newman also had a son Scott, who died in 1978.

In Israel and among Jews worldwide, he will always be remembered as Ari Ben Canaan, the Zionist rebel of Exodus who seizes a cargo ship and smuggles 600 Holocaust survivors to Palestine despite British opposition.

Otto Preminger, who directed the 1960 epic on location in Cyprus and Israel, said he chose Newman because he wanted an actor of Jewish origin who didn't look Jewish.

The actor was born in Cleveland, Ohio, on Jan. 26, 1925, to an affluent family. His Jewish father, Arthur, owned the city's largest sporting goods store, which his Catholic mother, Theresa, born in Slovakia, helped run.

In a 1980 interview with Time magazine, Newman said he identified himself as Jewish, stating, "it's more of a challenge."

As an actor, Newmah got his start in theatre and on television during the 1950s, and went on to become one of the world's most enduring and popular film stars, a legend held in awe by his peers.

With his strong, classically handsome face and piercing blue eyes, Newman was a heartthrob just as likely to play against his looks, becoming a favourite with critics for his convincing portrayals of rebels, tough guys and losers.

As he passed his 80th birthday, he remained in demand, winning an Emmy and a Golden Globe for the 2005 HBO cable television drama Empire Falls and providing the voice of a crusty 1951 car in the 2006 Disney-Pixar hit Cars.

But in May 2007, he told ABC television's Good Morning America that he had given up acting, although he intended to remain active in charity projects.

"I'm not able to work anymore as an actor at the level I would want to," he said. "You start to lose your memory, your confidence, your invention. So that's pretty much a closed book for me."

True to his fiercely private nature, Newman remained cagey about his condition, reacting to reports that he had lung cancer with a statement saying only that he was doing nicely.

Newman, who shunned Hollywood life, was reluctant to give interviews and usually refused to sign autographs, because he found the act offensive, according to one friend. He also claimed that he never read reviews of his movies.

"If they're good, you get a fat head, and if they're bad you're depressed for three weeks," he said.

Vehicle used in attack

An Arab assailant plowed a vehicle into a crowd of Israeli soldiers in Jerusalem before being shot dead. Two soldiers were moderately injured and more than a dozen others suffered slight injuries on the night of Sept. 22. The driver was killed by a soldier at the scene. The soldiers, who were on a tour of the Old City, were struck at a crowded intersection near the Jaffa Gate by an Arab from eastern Jerusalem driving a black BMW, according to reports. Police said that Kasem Mugrabi, 19, may have staged the attack out of disappointment over a rejected marriage proposal. It was the third time in recent months that an Arab from eastern Jerusalem has used a vehicle to perpetrate an attack. Defence Minister Ehud Barak urged the government to find ways to be able to legally and quickly raze the homes of terrorists as a deterrent to future potential attacks.

Bush nixed attack: report

U.S. President George W. President Bush reportedly vetoed Israel's plans to bomb Iran's nuclear weapons sites. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert asked Bush's approval when the president was in Israel in May, commemorating its 60th anniversary, the Guardian reported Sept. 25. Bush turned down the request, the report said, fearing Iranian attacks on U.S. interests in the region and beyond. Bush also was not convinced Israel would be able to stop the suspected nuclear weapons program. The Guardian quoted sources close to a European leader who was briefed by Olmert on the meeting with Bush.

Pipe bomb wounds Israeli Prize winner

A professor who won the Israel Prize was wounded by a pipe bomb at his Jerusalem home. Police said they believe far right-wing activists carried out the attack against Ze'ev Sternhell, a political science professor at Hebrew University known for his hostility toward Jewish communities in the West Bank. Sternhell, who returned to Israel last Wednesday from an extended period overseas, had been receiving threatening phone calls recently, his wife said. The bombing sent him to the hospital with minor leg wounds. A special task force will investigate. A security detail has been assigned to the head of Peace Now in Israel, Yaniv Oppenheimer, after pamphlets were found near Sternhell's home offering a reward for the murder of anyone connected to Peace Now.

Bomb scare on flight

Fighter planes from three countries escorted a Paris passenger flight to Tel Aviv suspected of carrying a bomb. Israeli officials later said there was no bomb on the El Al Boeing 767. The plane and passengers landed safely at Tel Aviv's Ben-Gurion Airport last Wednesday evening, and the aircraft was searched after passengers were evacuated. Officials ultimately concluded there was no bomb. Reports said a threat linked to Al Qaeda was passed on to authorities after the flight took off from Paris. During intervals of its trajectory, which included Greek territory, the plane was escorted by fighter jets from Greece, Israel and France.

Smart money bets on successful coalition

(2) A "peace" government: this would be a minority government with the dovish Meretz party instead of the Orthodox Shas party. Ten Knesset members from the three mainly Arab parties would tacitly back the government from outside the coalition. The aim would be to cut a final peace agreement with the Palestinians and then go for a national election that would serve as a referendum of sorts on the deal.

But given Livni's hawkish background, her reluctance to be forced into make-or-break negotiations with the Palestinians and the certainty of vociferous right-wing condemnation, Livni is unlikely to go for a coalition dependent on Arab Knesset votes and Palestinian good faith.

But by keeping the door open to Meretz, Livni is pressuring Shas to moderate its terms for joining her government. She could even make a double gain by inviting the fervently Orthodox Torah Judaism party to join her peace government. This would give her a majority without Arab party support and without Shas. But Torah Judaism is unlikely to support peace policies that include concessions on Jerusalem.

(3) A government based on the current coalition: Kadima, Labor, Shas and the Pensioners' party. This is Livni's most realistic option. The problem here, however, is that Shas is caught between a possible deal on child allowances with Livni and Netanyahu's promises for more if Shas helps force an early election. Much will depend on how tough Livni is with Shas.

Then again, if she is successful in forming a coalition with Labor and Shas, Livni may be able to reduce their leverage by bringing in additional coalition partners such as Meretz, Torah Judaism or even possibly the hawkish Yisrael Beiteinu.

Until Livni forms a government, Olmert will remain the acting prime minister. How the actual business of government is conducted in the coming weeks will depend on the degree of co-operation between these two erstwhile political foes.

That's another reason for Livni to want to conclude coalition negotiations as quickly as possible. The smart money says she will have a government fairly soon – its composition will say a lot about the direction in which she is about to lead the country.

Polish Jew returned to his roots after visiting cemeteries

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In the land of the dead, Stanislaw Krajewski returned to the land of the living.

Krajewski's odyssey back to his Jewish roots began in Poland's forlorn and abandoned Jewish cemeteries and ended with his embrace of his suppressed Jewish identity.

The son of deeply assimilated Jews who were staunch Communists and regarded their Jewishness as an embarrassing and inconvenient vestige, he regained his identity in an incremental process that required persistent effort and determination.

"Jewish topics were virtually taboo in my home," said Krajewski, a resident of Warsaw who was in Toronto last month as a guest of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada. "My parents thought that Jewishness was irrelevant in postwar Poland. It was something from the past that had no connection to the present."

A member of the board of the Union of Jewish Religious Communities in Poland and a professor of philosophy at Warsaw University, he was a so-called red-diaper baby when he was born in 1950.

His father, Wladyslaw, a philosopher who taught at Warsaw University, hailed from a line of socialists and Communists and was convinced that Poland had changed after the postwar Communist revolution.

He was a true believer, even though his own father, exiled in Moscow, was murdered during the Stalinist purges of the 1930s.

Krajewski's mother, Esther, a biologist from a traditional Jewish family, was just as alienated from her Jewish background.

"My Jewish identity was non-existent," recalled Krajewski. "I thought I was a Pole, though, not being Catholic, I knew we were not like the rest of our neighbours."

Krajewski was so distant from his Jewish background that he could not figure out obvious connections.

"We had family in Israel, but I didn't know what Israel meant," he explained.

In 1963, on the 20th anniversary of the Warsaw ghetto uprising, he wrote a timely school essay on that revolt, never quite realizing that he had an indirect personal relationship with it.

In retrospect, he now thinks, he first glimpsed intimations of his Jewish heritage in 1956, when he and his parents visited Israel for the first time and, much to his surprise, he heard his mother speaking Yiddish to her father and brother, who had immigrated to the Jewish state after the war.

Krajewski was taken aback by her foray into Yiddish, because she had always claimed she was not conversant in it. In Poland, however, she never deigned to use Yiddish. Like her Polonized husband, she had an aversion toward using Yiddish on Polish soil.

Asked whether his parents were self-hating Jews, Krajewski replied, "That's too strong. They simply felt that Jewishness was not part of their lives."

Looking back at the state-sponsored anti-Semitic campaign that erupted in Poland after the 1967 Six Day War and that led to the emigration of some 30,000 assimilated Jews, Krajewski said he and his parents were certainly affected by it.

"We felt we were under attack. Anti-Semitism became part of the official government line. It was a decisive moment in the life of every Jew."

Nonetheless, Krajewski has rarely been directly affected by anti-Semitism. "Sometimes, I have heard unpleasant words," he allowed.

Although his parents were Communists, they never encouraged him to join the Communist party. "Science, modernity and universal values were important to me," said Krajewski, who joined the anti-Communist Solidarity trade union movement during its underground period.

With the anti-Semitic genie out of the bottle after 1967, Krajewski embarked on a momentous spiritual journey that ultimately brought him back to Jewish roots.

As he writes in his memoir, Poland and the Jews, "I felt the power of the Jewish condition and sensed the apparently unavoidable character of the Jewish fate. Still, I lacked any serious Jewish knowledge."

On further reflection, Krajewski said in an interview, he set out on his quest because did not want to defined as a Jew by anti-Semites.

Although his parents did not support his decision to reclaim his Jewish identity, they did not oppose it either.

He took his first small step by accompanying his wife, Monika – a Catholic photographer who later converted to Judaism – to "dead," or unvisited, Jewish cemeteries in Poland.

Stanislaw Krajewski

"To understand the inscriptions on the tombstones, we had to learn some Hebrew and rudimentary Judaism," he explained.

As he delved into the subject, he discovered that Jewish tradition appealed to him. So he became an observant Jew. Previously, he had explored Christianity and Buddhism, but these faiths were not sufficiently compelling.

Later, as the 1970s wore on, he became one of the founders of the Jewish Flying University, an intense underground seminar in Judaism and Jewish history. "It was important and therapeutic," he said of the Jewish Flying University. "I learned to say 'I'm Jewish' in a normal tone of voice."

By that juncture, his parents were no longer affiliated with the ruling Communist party, although they were still "non-Jewish Jews," to use British historian Isaac Deutscher's famous phrase.

His father, a dissident who criticized the Soviet Union's 1968 invasion of Czechoslovakia, was expelled from the party, while his mother left voluntarily in the aftermath of the Six Day War.

Even at the height of the infamous anti-Semitic campaign, Krajewski never seriously considered settling abroad.

"I'm in Poland to stay," said Krajewski, whom Rabbi Dow Marmur of Toronto, a Polish Jew himself, describes as "one of the leading Jewish intellectuals in Poland."

Or as Krajewski puts it in Poland and the Jews, "Many of us are Polish Polish Jews. Polish Jews who live in Poland, and who treat Poland as their homeland rather than just a place of origin. Most of us want to remain Polish."

Elaborating on this theme, Krajewski, the father of two grown sons, said, "I feel completely at home and comfortable in Poland, though some political events anger me."

Krajewski's sister, Sofia, a bank worker, has moved closer to her Jewish roots as well, and one of her daughters lives in Israel.

His father died two years ago as an unrepentant Communist, but his mother has accepted his "conversion" and wishes him "Shabbat Shalom" when the Sabbath rolls around.

He is heartened by the fact that some Poles, knowing that Poland was home to more than three million Jews in 1939, evince a nostalgic interest in Poland's rich Jewish legacy.

Yet he is not certain that the Jewish community, numbering from 6,000 to 8,000, has a bright future.

"We're growing, but the growth is slow," he said. "It would be a tragedy if Poland became Judenrein. I hope this will not be the case. But for historical reasons, Poland will always be important for Jews."

PLANNING FOR RETIREMENT?

L'Shana Tova! "Giving Thanks"

This is the time of year when we reflect on the past year and anticipate the coming year. Very soon we will also give thanks the abundance we enjoy in our lives – not only for the good times we spend with family, friends and colleagues who enrich us. We need to be especially thankful if we are also able to appreciate all that we have without worry, because we have established a financial plan that we will leave loved ones debt-free, maintaining their lifestyle; that will protect us if we become disabled through illness or injury; and that allows us to look forward to a long and healthy retirement with enough income to maintain our own lifestyles; and do all of this while paying as little in taxes as is legally possible.

The Polish zookeepers who saved Jews

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Diane Ackerman's The Zookeepers's Wife (W.W. Norton) is one of the most unusual accounts about the Holocaust ever to be published.

This relatively slim volume is a sensitively told story about two Polish Catholic zookeepers in Warsaw who saved Jews by concealing them in unused buildings and empty zoo cages.

Diane Ackerman

It sounds too surrealistic to be true, but sometimes truth is stranger than fiction.

Ackerman is well equipped to tell this tale. She is a writer who has an affinity to the natural world, and in her capable hands, the courage of the zookeepers Jan and Antonina Zabinski manifests itself eloquently.

Horrified by Nazi racism, this altruistic couple rescued more than 300 people, a blend of Jews and members of the Polish underground resistance movement.

They knew perfectly well that their activities endangered them. But throwing caution to the wind, the Zabinskis carried on defiantly under the noses of the German occupation force.

In an author's note, Ackerman explains why they are a source of inspiration to her.

"Their story has fallen between the seams of history, as radically compassionate acts sometimes do. But in wartime Poland, when even handing a thirsty Jew a cup of water was punishable by death, their heroism stands out as all the more startling."

There was another reason Ackerman was drawn to the topic. Her maternal grandparents are from Poland.

Jan and Antonina met at Warsaw's College of Agriculture. She had studied languages, drawing and painting, and he was a professional zoologist who shared her relish for both animals and animalistic art. They were married in 1931, two years after he was appointed director of the zoo.

Their lives were upended with Germany's invasion Poland on Sept. 1, 1939. But the effect that war had on the creatures in the zoo was even more calamitous.

As Ackerman writes: "The elephants trumpeted wildly, the hyenas sobbed in a frightened sort of giggle interrupted by hiccups, the African hunting dogs howled and the rhesus monkeys, agitated beyond sanity, battled one another, their hysterical shrieks clawing the air."

Shortly after the German army rolled into Poland, Jan was conscripted into the Polish army, but with Poland's defeat, he returned to his duties.

By then, the zoo had been heavily damaged and many of its animals killed by German air raids.

Jan stayed on so that the zoo could be used as an arms and ammunition depot for the Home Army, the dominant Polish resistance movement.

He and Antonina were soon involved in helping Jewish friends in the Warsaw ghetto. She prepared small packets of food and he delivered them to the closed-off ghetto.

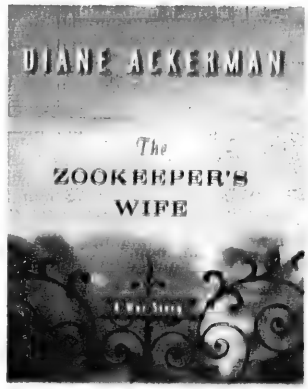
The ghetto's Jewish inmates were desperately hungry. Germans were entitled to rations of 2,613 calories a day, while Poles received 669 calories and Jews had to make do with 184 calories. Clearly, the Nazi occupiers had a plan. Hans Frank, the German governor of Poland, said, "I ask nothing of the Jews except that they disappear."

Jan's philo-Semitic attitude was forged on the anvil of friendship with Jews.

As a boy, he attended a school where the study of Christianity was not required and where 80 per cent of the students were Jewish. He was enrolled in that school because his father was a staunch atheist.

Jan made friends with Jews and, unlike some Poles, he was not anti-Semitic. Later, as a teacher at a predominantly Jewish school, he befriended still more Jews.

One of his Jewish friends, Szymon Tenenbaum, was a renowned entomologist who had amassed a vast insect collection. Confined to the ghetto, he died in 1941. Before his death, Jan smuggled Tenenbaum's collection out of the ghetto. Three weeks before the general Warsaw uprising in 1944, he moved it to the safety of the Natural History Museum.



The Zabinskis began rescuing Jews in 1943, less than a year after the Nazis deported 265,000 ghetto residents to the Treblinka death camp, leaving 55,000 Jews in the ghetto.

As a gift to Adolf Hitler, the head of the SS, Heinrich Himmler, swore to liquidate the rest of the Jews in the ghetto. The killing process was launched on April 19, the first day of Passover, under the direction of Major General Jurgen Stroop, the commander of an SS brigade. To Stroops' utter surprise, the Jews fought back in a heroic uprising, defending positions behind barricades with pistols, rifles, one machine gun and Molotov cocktails.

Stung by the ferocious response, he dispatched 2,090 soldiers, backed by tanks, into the centre of the ghetto.

As the fighting raged, Polish underground newspapers called on Poles to help escaping Jews find shelter.

The Zabinskis, Ackerman says, "eagerly obliged."

Ackerman neglects to mention that far too many Poles were indifferent to the tragedy unfolding in the ghetto and did not, in fact, assist Jews. Some Poles were even manifestly hostile to Jews.

It was during this dark period that the Zabinskis established their credentials as compassionate Christians. Ackerman, at length, describes their selfless acts of heroism, which earned them a citation from the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial and museum in Jerusalem.

She uses their heroics as a platform to describe the efforts of other Poles to help Jews melt into Polish society.

One Polish woman taught Jewish women Christian prayers and how to cook and serve pork, while a Polish plastic surgeon reshaped Jewish noses and operated on men to restore foreskins.

Captured by the Germans during the 1944 Warsaw uprising, Jan was interned by the Germans. His wife, meanwhile, tended to the needs of Jews in her care.

Returning from the internment camp in 1946, he resumed his job at the zoo, cleaning and repairing it.

The zoo was reopened in the summer of 1949, but in 1951, when Jan was 54, he retired. Ackerman speculates that, as a veteran of the Home Army, he was not in favour in a country that was under the thumb of the Soviet Union.

With Antonina at his side, he spent the rest of his life writing books about the animal kingdom and hosting a popular radio program on the same subject.

But to the grateful Jews he and his wife had rescued, his chief claim to fame was not zoology but humanitarianism.

Tamara Podemski returns to TO for role in Wild Dog

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Toronto actress Tamara Podemski, 31, is back home from Los Angeles to play Alice in the world theatrical première of Helen Humphreys' novel Wild Dogs.

In Wild Dogs, adapted for the stage by Anne Hardcastle, Alice is on the run from a bad relationship. She joins five other people who gather each evening at the edge of the woods to call their dogs – dogs that have turned wild. Drawn together by need, this group is a community until violence strikes unexpectedly.

"Alice is the narrator of this story, about a summer that changed six peoples' lives in a huge way," Podemski says. "It is through Alice that we can really understand the heartache and the loss. Even though all of them are feeling similar experiences, Alice is the one that represents the story of love."

Podemski, the winner of the Sundance Film Festival 2007 Special Jury Prize for Acting – the first Canadian and first aboriginal to win this prize – and who last year was nominated for a Film Independent Spirit Award for her work in the film Four Sheets to the Wind, brings a wealth of talent to the stage.

"I relate to Alice, probably a little too close for comfort, because we meet Alice as she is leaving a relationship, then falls in love. This love affair blows her entire universe open and turns her world upside down, her insides – inside out," Podemski says.

"I can say that there has been a few times in my life where I jumped in head first and risked everything for love. It is terrifying to lose yourself in love, which I wish I didn't know so well, but I do. That approach gets you hurt, but allows you to taste some of the most beautiful feelings in the world."

Tamara Podemski

Podemski graduated from the Claude Watson School for the Performing Arts in Toronto. Along with acting, she sings, writes songs and is a dancer. Her television and film credits include Dance Me Outside, The Rez, North of 60, Moose TV, Rabbit Fall and New Amsterdam. She's performed in several theatre productions, including the original Canadian and Broadway productions of Rent.

Podemski was born to an Ojibwa mother and a Jewish Israeli father, and has two sisters, Sarah and Jennifer, both of whom are also actors. The three sisters were the subject of Jennifer's CBC documentary Pamieci, about their trip to Lodz, Poland, with their grandfather, who went there to revisit his past and to come to terms with his family's death in the Holocaust.

Raised by their dad, Podemski thinks of herself as very spiritual and has embraced both parents' cultures. "We grew up in a very secular family. I'm in Israel every few years – half of my family is still there. I am much more connected with Israel and the culture than I am with a synagogue.

"Our whole upbringing was part of the socialist youth movement Hashomer Hatzair – my grandfather was part of it in Poland," says Podemski. "Hashomer Hatzair has a winter and summer camp, so from six years old to 16 years old, we grew up in that movement – performing in the talent shows and choreographing routines."

She recently returned from Berlin, where she was teaching workshops about Native studies. She experienced a kind of cultural collision there as her late Jewish grandmother was from the German city. She walked through the Jewish Quarter where her grandmother grew up. This was her chance to connect with her grandmother, as she was able to do in Poland with her grandfather, she says.

Podemski's upcoming projects include the Native Theater Festival at the Public Theater in New York City and Marie Clement's The Edward Curtis Project for Presentation House Theatre, as part of the 2010 Cultural Olympiad at the Vancouver Olympics. Podemski will soon be recording her fourth album, for which she wrote all the songs.

Back in Toronto, she's enjoying spending time with friends and family, who she hasn't seen for a year. When living in Toronto in the past, Podemski ran a dance studio called Body Alive, teaching modern and jazz classes. Podemski will resume giving classes every Sunday while she's here.

Wild Dogs is presented by Nightwood Theatre, in association with the Canadian Stage Company, and is directed by Kelly Thornton. The novel on which the play is based won the 2005 Lambda Award for fiction and was voted one of NOW magazine's Top 10 books of 2004. The book's film rights have been optioned.

Wild Dogs runs at Berkeley Street Theatre from Oct. 4 to Nov. 8. For tickets, contact 416-368-3110 or www.nightwoodtheatre.net. Tamara Podemski's website address is www.tamarapodemski.com.

Singer expresses identity through Sephardi music

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When Ellen Gould Ventura was 18, a young woman on the cusp of adulthood, her mother divulged a secret that changed her life.

She told her that she is Jewish and, more particularly, that she is a Sephardi Jew.

For Ventura, a Toronto-born singer, writer and actor, everything suddenly made sense and fell into place.

"I had felt this in my soul," she says.

Ventura's discovery of her ancestral roots forms an integral component of Mashala, an hour-long documentary on the soulful performer, scheduled to be broadcast on Vision TV on Oct. 3 at 10 p.m. and again at midnight.

Mashala, directed by Cyrus Sundar Singh, moves easily between Ventura's Jewishness and her band, Mashala, which performs Sephardi music.

It was created after she and her husband moved to Barcelona in 1998.

Ventura describes Mashala "an exercise in diversity," and she is right.

The musicians come from Morocco, Chile, Italy and Venezuela, and the sounds they produce are a haunting mélange of Jewish and Arabic melodies.

In Mashala, they perform at street corners, squares, recording studios and concerts.

Far from regarding the band members as only fellow musicians, Ventura considers them as the "brothers" she never had.

Ventura's personal history is complicated.

After her parents separated, Ventura's mother settled in southern Spain, taking her two daughters along.

In the wake of her mother's startling revelation, Ventura was slow to relate completely to her Jewish background. But today, she fully embraces it, at least through music and culture.

Ellen Gould Ventura performs with Mashala band members.

"It's a homecoming," she says.

The songs she sings are inflected with a definite Hebrew intonation, and Ventura revels in them.

A member of Barcelona's progressive Jewish community, she claims that Mashala's eclectic repertoire is representative of the "brotherhood" of Judaism, Islam and Christianity.

Certainly, Mashala reinforces her identity. "This is how I express my spirituality," she observes. "It's about connecting and finding the thread, and passing on the thread so that it doesn't get lost."

Mashala is one of several documentaries on Jewish topics that Vision TV began to air from Sept. 29 onward.

Veterans honoured at Azrieli's book launch

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Eleven veterans of Israel's War of Independence were honoured recently at a ceremony at Beth Tzedec Congregation marking the launch of Rekindling the Torch (Key Porter), a new book on the history of Canadian Zionism by Montreal-based businessman-philanthropist David J. Azrieli.

Azrieli, 86, himself a veteran of the Israeli war, called up each of the 11 former members of Machal, the organization for foreign volunteers in the Israeli armed forces. An audience of several hundred people showed its exuberant appreciation as each came on stage to accept a book.

The Machalniks, some of whom had also served in Canada's armed forces during World War II, were Jack Berger, Howard Cossman, Murray Ginsberg, Jerry Gross, Harold Kates, Abe Levine, Irving Matlow, Ben Ocopnick, Gerry Rosenberg, Joseph Warner and Sam Wasser. Many were wearing the thin strip of medals they had earned fighting for Israel's survival some 60 years ago.

"It's an honour to be in the presence this evening of a number of these heroes of human freedom," said keynote speaker Jason Kenney, the secretary of state for multiculturalism and Canadian identity.

Kenney described Rekindling the Torch as "a handsomely produced labour of love." He had just been with Prime Minister Stephen Harper, he said, and Harper had asked him to convey to Azrieli and his co-author, Joe King, "his admiration and gratitude for bringing to life this central part, this key part of Canada's shared history with Israel and the Jewish people."

Kenney voiced the strong support for Israel that has been a trademark of the Harper government. He described Zionism as "one of the most positive, hopeful and constructive forces in a century of destructive hateful and inhuman ideologies… The founding of the State of Israel in 1948 was one of the few bright shining lights in that century of darkness."

Co-author Joe King recounted several episodes in the history of Canadian Zionism, as told in the book. For example: Shimon Peres, then a 25-year-old emissary for Israel, visited businessman Sam Bronfman in Montreal to enlist his help in persuading the Canadian government to lower the price on a shipment of cannons. After the price was reduced from $2.5 million to $2 million, Bronfman asked Peres, 'Where you gonna get the $2 million?' and Peres responded, 'From you.'"

A student at Technion when war broke out, Azrieli recalled the moment when Zionist leader David Ben-Gurion's voice came over the radio in a crowded mess hall and proclaimed the Jewish nation into existence, soon followed by the news that Arab armies had begun to attack. He started researching the book 12 years ago, he said, because "I wanted Jews and non-Jews to know about the history of the Zionist movement in Canada."

Other participants in the book launch were Ralph Benmergui, master of ceremonies; Cantor Simon Spiro, who sang two songs; and Moshe Ronen, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, who introduced the guest speaker.

TV 'dramedy' set in Winnipeg Jewish household

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

A Winnipeg Jewish family is about to get some huge television exposure this month.

Granted, the Blechers are a fictional family. Still, that shouldn't stop viewers from tuning in to a new Canadian comedy called Less Than Kind on Citytv at 10:30 p.m. on Oct. 13.

The show is produced by Kids in the Hall alumnus Mark McKinney and co-written by Canadian Jewish scribe Marvin Kaye – the series is loosely based on Kaye's childhood experiences growing up in Winnipeg – and Chris Sheasgreen. Less Than Kind promises to be quirky, funny and heartwarming.

The show's first season – shot on location during the winter of 2007 – gently skewers Winnipeg as a land constantly frozen over and always overcast.

Kaye said he and Sheasgreen set out to use the ambience of the city's notoriously harsh winters as a kind of "character" on its own for the series.

Companion Wanted

Seniors looking for travelling companion to share accommodations and costs on world cruise.

For more information call (514) 481-0883 between 9 a.m. - 6 p.m.

Even the show's theme song I Hate Winnipeg, sung by Canadian indie band The Weakerthans, is intended to good-naturedly rib the city for its reputation as a cold, bleak metropolis.

"People bitch about Winnipeg, but it's such a great town," Kaye said. "I wrote [Less Than Kind] as a play in 1995. Chris and I... pulled the script off the shelf in 2004 and pitched it."

Eventually, Citytv came calling, and based on the strength of the plot, characters and a "six-hour marathon meeting," McKinney said, the show was given the green light.

The family's Judaism is understated in the show, but Kaye said he inserted much of the Jewish dialogue and feel based on his own upbringing.

"Anybody can relate to this show," Sheasgreen said. "It's about family, whether Jewish or not."

And what a family it is.

Veteran screen actor Maury Chaykin plays patriarch Sam Blecher, a slightly unhinged, yet devoted father who runs the family's driving-school business and has a penchant for bartering his services for all manner of goods.

In one hilarious episode, the Blechers must deal with a tax audit of the family business. When the auditor accidentally stumbles into the family's garage, he discovers Sam's stash of bartered items, which include a whole prosciutto, 50 Korean wedding dresses, a dentist's chair and industrial quantities of condoms.

When pressed by the auditor to explain how the prophylactics are strictly for Sam's personal use, as he claims, he deadpans: "I've got two boys. I gotta buy in bulk."

Mark McKinney, the producer of Less Than Kind, and Maury Chaykin, who has a role in the series, share some love at a local Toronto restaurant earlier this year.

Actor Wendel Meldrum plays Anne, the mother, who struggles with a latent pyromaniacal bent, lighting fires whenever her family's antics become too much for her.

Benjamin Arthur plays older brother Josh, an aspiring actor and perpetual underachiever whose sole function in life seems to be to torture his younger brother, Sheldon.

Speaking of whom, Sheldon, played pitch-perfectly by Montreal native Jesse Camacho – he also played a young Duddy Kravitz in last year's CBC presentation of Mordecai Richler's St. Urbain's Horseman – is the nexus of the show.

A book-smart, slightly geeky, overweight and awkward adolescent, Sheldon is the family glue. He tries to navigate his way through both the perils of high school and his home by remaining as sane as possible and playing the straight man to his friends and family's near-constant state of dysfunction.

Camacho, who isn't Jewish, said it was easy for him to inhabit the role.

IN PARTNERSHIP WITH

Gehry-designed AGO set to open in November

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Those who have seen the Guggenheim Museum in Bilbao, Spain, agree that there is no greater magnet than that experience. No building could be more powerful, says Matthew Teitelbaum, CEO and director of the Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO)

The lure of the structures designed by Los Angeles-based architect Frank Gehry was one of the reasons the AGO were delighted when Gehry agreed to design its $276-million expansion project, he said.

"Walking through the DG Bank in Berlin and understanding how Frank essentially took the limitations of the exterior form and created an interior, was truly magical," he said.

Gehry, an iconic architect who grew up in Toronto, was a likely choice for the AGO project.

It took two years of planning with Gehry's team in Los Angeles and Toronto – looking at buildings they liked, program needs to make sure the focus would be on the art, and Gehry's vision of the interior, before they discussed what the exterior would look like, Teitelbaum said.

"The whole sense of building something in an environment that is meaningful to you is of itself interesting, but I would say, first and foremost, we were attracted to Frank because of his understanding of what it meant to present art in a building, in a space, how you create spaces for the experience of art," he said.

Their plan was threefold: to create a building with clear pathways giving easy access to art; to celebrate transparency by making what the museum does behind the scenes visible; and to celebrate the gallery's position in the centre of the city.

"In the end, the mantra really was about the experience of art – how to create a building that enhances the experience of works of art, like Frank's use of natural light, the way you move through space and Frank's response by putting glass on the front and the back, reminding people where they are," Teitelbaum said.

Gehry's sculptured front, called the Gallery Italia, extends out to Dundas Street, making the visitor feel there is an intimate link between the AGO and the smaller buildings across the street.

In contrast, on the south side of the building, there is a glassed-in contemporary tower that provides a vista of the city.

"In the new building, there will also be some surprises – works of art that we owned but haven't been seen by the public. But what I think will be most extraordinary is the art that has come to us as gifts, or in some cases, selected purchases since Transformation AGO began," Teitelbaum said. "When you add it up, 40 per cent of the art that will be on view was not at the art gallery before, so it'll be quite a different experience."

Matthew Teitelbaum

The gifts the gallery has received include the late Ken Thomson's $300-million art collection, the Frum collection of African art, Inuit art donated by Esther and Samuel Sarrick and collections of extraordinary photography.

"We've created the AGO for everybody," Teitelbaum said. "We want it to be a place where people feel comfortable, a place that helps define who they are. I hope people will experience the sense of welcome, that they belong here and when they're here they have a real sense of engagement with art of the highest quality, but also with art that activates something in their own thinking, a place that sparks their own creativity.

"If people were to stop me on the street and tell me that, in a year's time or six month's time, the art gallery was doing that for them, I'd feel it was all worth it."

The new AGO opens Nov. 14. Admission will be free until Nov. 16.

Chaykin stars in show

"Sheldon is similar to me in some ways. But the writing is all there. Marvin [Kaye] would always tell me little things about [how to act] Jewish, and Maury really comes off that way," he said.

The other cast members all concurred and added that the greatest challenge on set was simply to stay warm after filming in weather that sometimes reached - 48C

"When you get a role like this, you wanna honour where it comes from," Arthur said. "My character's Jewishness doesn't play a major part… [but] we can now write books on how to work in winter."

As for McKinney, jumping on another comedy production was an easy decision to make, he said.

"The characters attracted me. It just had heart in the comedy," McKinney said.

"All dysfunctional families are unique. The fact [the Blechers] are Jewish makes them relatable. And I'm in showbiz, so I think I've met one Jew," Mckinney quipped.

For Chaykin, the role of Jewish father took no preparation. Growing up in a Jewish family in Brooklyn, N.Y., allowed him to become Sam Blecher with little difficulty.

"I've never had such a great time working on a series," he told The CJN. "It's not about a kosher family, it's about a Jewish family. They're not a perfect Jewish family. It was very courageous of Citytv to do 13 episodes of such a family. I think most networks would be terrified and would have portrayed [the Blechers] more politically correct for fear of offending viewers."

(Citytv also put the show in the later evening time slot due to the coarse language in some of the episodes.)

Chaykin said that playing Sam, who he described as "delusional," enabled him to tap into the part of himself that's "out of control" and revel in the humour.

Less Than Kind should present Canadians with something they haven't seen in a while – a comedy that at its core is both sweet and vulnerable while anchored by a Jewish family that isn't afraid to express its love in the most eccentric ways.

And that's likely due, in most part, to the cabin fever that has set in, because it's just too darn cold in Winnipeg to leave the house.

Breaking the fast with a trip across the street

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

So you think that you've got a big crowd coming to your house for breaking the fast? Not compared to Marsha Nagorsky of Chicago. Nagorsky lives right across the street from the family's shul, and for the past eight years, she and her husband, along with another couple, host a breaking of the fast for members of their congregation.

I spoke to Nagorsky by phone recently, and she said, "It's only a 30-second walk across the street, so 30 seconds after the shofar blows, everyone is walking across the street to my house! We usually invite at least 100 people, but this year we're hoping for 130 to 140 people, including the kids.

"We'll probably increase most quantities 30 to 50 per cent this year, to accommodate the increased crowd. My husband, Brian, and I host with our dear friends, Keith Alperin and Liz Lippow. This will be the 8th Annual Easy-Access Break-Fast. We could not do it without the whole community helping by bringing things, cleaning up and generally showing up and making it fun. It's truly one of the most satisfying things I do all year.

"Our community is very special. We are a lay-led minyan within a large, very welcoming city shul. Our rabbis are extremely supportive of us, and most of us are very active in shul life. We are a Conservative congregation, and many minyan members consider themselves observant – most of us keep kosher, and about half of the minyan participants are shomer Shabbat. Laypeople within the community do all the functions of the service – delivering divrei Torah, acting as shaliach tzibur, leyening, co-ordinating services, 'gabbaing,' etc. We also participate in a community-led set of services (one of three service choices at our shul) on the High Holidays.

"I am one of the people who leads the services on the High Holidays, and my husband is the co-ordinator for all the volunteers for the service. Brian and I are very blessed to be part of both our shul and our minyan, and we consider our community one of the most important and meaningful parts of our life. Hosting the break-fast is our small way of giving back to that community."

The two co-hosting couples split most of the cooking, while others are delegated to bring food or beverages or help with cleanup. Nagorsky has designed a spreadsheet and assigns foods to be prepared and tasks to be done accordingly.

She told me they don't serve fish because it makes people queasy. Nothing spicy is served, and the food has to be simple to prepare and easy to digest. She keeps notes from year to year, adjusting the quantities, so she has it down to a science. The following quantities are designed to serve approximately 100 people.

Beverages include four gallons each of bottled water, apple juice and lemonade, six gallons of orange juice, one quart of milk (for coffee), four litres of caffeinated and four litres of decaffeinated pop, along with herbal tea, coffee and lots of ice. Beverages are placed throughout the house because people are really dehydrated.

There are three containers of hummus, three bags of pita, four- to five-gallon ziploc bags of crudités, homemade babaghanouj (made from three large eggplants), curry dip, onion dip and a container of olives. These are served in the vestibule when people first arrive.

The egg salad is made by Brian, and everyone loves it. He uses five dozen eggs and seasons them with mustard, his "secret ingredient." There is a tray of blintz souffle, four quiches and four different noodle kugels. There are also five pounds of lox, six containers of whipped cream cheese, two regular containers of cream cheese, plus 1/2-gallon ziploc bags filled with tomatoes, onions and cucumbers. And let's not forget the four dozen bagels!

Other favourites include three trays of Nagorsky's baked ziti, four carrot kugels (she uses the recipe from The Kosher Palate) and two trays of her friend Sandra's macaroni and cheese.

There are three large, homemade challahs, which are a specialty of their friend Keith, along with a big bowl of his mildly seasoned pasta salad. There's also couscous salad, which is quite popular, eggplant salad, and tuna salad made from six cans of tuna.

Sweets include one batch of lemon squares, two batches of butterscotch squares, two batches of chocolate chip cookies, two loaves of pumpkin chocolate chip cake, two batches of not-too-rich brownies, some mandelbread, fresh fruit such as grapes and strawberries, a big bowl of fruit salad and at least two other desserts.

The noodle kugels are all different and are made by four different people: Everyone waits anxiously for their favourite one to get to the buffet table and enter into discussions as to why they like a particular kugel.

They have a drop-off time, usually about two hours before Kol Nidrei (between 3 and 5:30 p.m.). Nagorsky has two young sons; one is 3-1/2 and the other is a year old. Last year, Yom Kippur was four weeks after she gave birth, so it was quite stressful for her. However, she feels this year will be easier, especially since she bought a new fridge for the basement to handle the huge quantities of food.

A few weeks before Yom Kippur, Nagorsky sends an "e-vite" to the guests. (I got one too!) Everyone in the community loves to come and they love to pitch in and help.

She told me people often come across to their house for a nap during services!

Nagorsky does all of her own setup with the help of a friend. When I asked her why she does breaking of the fast for such a large crowd, she replied, "If I didn't do this, some people wouldn't have a place to go."

Soccer squad wins silver medal

DETROIT — After opening ceremonies at the Palace of Auburn Hills, where the Detroit Pistons play, Toronto's team of 59 athletes and 12 coaches got down to business at this summer's JCC Maccabi Games.

Toronto competed in boys and girls under-16 soccer, girls basketball, boys baseball, tennis, as well as some swimming events. Other Canadian delegations included those from Montreal, Vancouver, Ottawa, Winnipeg, Windsor and Hamilton.

Toronto's medals included a silver in boys under-16 soccer, a silver in tennis singles for David Klein, a silver in tennis doubles for Danielle Sadofsky, and a swimming bronze for Josh Suskin.

Next year's games will be held at the Jewish Community Center of Mid Westchester in Scarsdale, N.Y., with opening ceremonies at Madison Square Garden.

Pitcher smacks grand slam at Shea

NEW YORK — Jason Marquis of the Chicago Cubs last week became the first Jewish pitcher to crack a grand slam home run since 1950.

Marquis, a right-hander, connected to right field off Mets rookie lefty Jonathan Niese at Shea Stadium. The homer, part of a six-run fourth inning, propelled the Cubs to a 9-5 victory. Marquis also picked up the mound win to raise his record to 11-9.

The last Jewish pitcher to hit a grand slam was Saul Rogovin of the Detroit Tigers in 1950. Rogovin smashed his homer off Eddie Lopat of the New York Yankees.

The Mayor and Members of Council of the Town of Markham wish you a happy and healthy New Year.

Trick or treated?

ALMOST FAMOUS

By Jacob Medjuck

Every year, I am of two minds about the effort I'm about to put into the upcoming holidays, both secular and Jewish. This season, I've decided instead to let the holidays duke it out amongst themselves.

Halloween 1986: "Hi Jacob, do you remember when you were a kid and you wrapped your face in foil and went around as toy soldier? Aside from the alarming, high-contact aluminum exposure and the condensation pruning your face, that was a pretty fun costume! Halloween rules!"

Purim 1986: "Hi Jacob, remember when your dad finally let you take his heirloom wooden gregor to shul, and you got to make the loudest, most uncomfortable wood-crank noise possible, right in the main sanctuary where the rabbi was, and where you usually get in trouble for making even the slightest whisper? Man, that was awesome! Purim rocks!"

Halloween 1987: "Remember when your mom let you use a sharp knife to carve out your own pumpkin face instead of you just drawing out the image and then she'd carve it for you instead. You finally got to play with knives. Halloween is awesome. Who cares about heirlooms as a measure of responsibility? Kids with knives rule!"

Purim: "If sex and violence float your boat, Purim is the original 90210: it features Mordechai pimping Esther to the King, Queen Vashti dancing naked during commercials, and beheadings! And you thought Gossip Girl was racy."

Halloween: "Ancient Persia may be racy, but for Halloween, women dress like cats and nurses. Fantastic! You won't see 'saucy' at a megillah reading."

Purim: "Maybe, but for Purim, you won't have to march outside in the cold and dark fall night for treats. Mishshloach manot get delivered to your door by friends and family."

Halloween: "Plates of figs and fruit? Bah humbug. Kids love chocolate bars."

Purim: "Hamantashen are delicious. Thin-wrapped or thick, poppy or prune pastries are divine."

Halloween: "Pastries are carbs."

Purim: "Candies are carbs, too, and the sugar shovel-a-thon is but a prelude to childhood diabetes."

Halloween: "Try salted pumpkin seeds then."

Purim: "Boppy seeds right back at you."

Halloween: "Halloween is spooky! Spooky is cool. M. Night Shyamalan anyone? Hitchcock? And witches, man. We hang witches! Oh, and Friday The 13th."

Purim: "We hung Haman and his 10 sons in public. We're totally spooky. Plus, the guy attempted to perpetrate a genocide on the Jewish people."

Halloween: "Fine. You're spooky, too."

Purim: "We've got spooky and story. We've got arc, drama and a heroic ending. Plot man. We've got plot. Halloween is all special effects: cotton-batting cobwebs and eerie-sounding CDs."

Halloween: "Kids love special effects!"

Purim: "But content is king."

Halloween: "We've got Frankenstein's monster."

Purim: "Frankenstein was grossly misunderstood. Plus, Franken-stein? Seriously. Stein? That's a point on our side, too. Anything Berg, Stein, Silver or Gold, and/or combinations of the two, counts as a point for us."

Halloween: "We've got Dracula!"

Purim: "We've still got Haman's attempted genocide."

Halloween: "Halloween has domestic market share."

Purim: "Windows computers have domestic market share, but Apple computers are still better."

Halloween: "We put razors in our apples. We're the bad boy of holidays. Chicks dig that."

Purim: "Our holiday empowers women. I think chicks dig that more."

Halloween: No response.

Purim: "Halloween's a fad. Purim has legacy. We're old-school cool. History-like. Rock the gregor."

Halloween 2008: "Fine. Hey Jacob, do you remember when you got invited to the Playboy Mansion for the upcoming Playboy Mansion Halloween this month?"

Purim 2008: "The Playboy Mansion? Really?"

Halloween 2008: "The Playboy Mansion."

Purim 2008: "Really?"

Halloween: "This October."

Purim: "We yield."

Winner: Halloween 2008.

See you at the grotto.

The importance of sleep

FITNESS CORNER

By Felyce Zomparelli

Sleep – everyone needs it, yet very few of us get enough. It's like water – we all know we should drink lots of it, but we rarely do.

We have been hearing for years about the importance of sleep for the body and the mind. The recommended amount of sleep is 7-1/2 to eight hours a night. Did you know that if you get the recommended eight hours of sleep a night consistently, you could loose weight – up to 10 pounds a year?

Your body needs to go through its sleep cycles to rejuvenate, restore and repair itself, and it takes eight full hours for the body to go through every cycle and completely repair itself from the day before.

Lack of sleep can cause a lot of problems, most of which you already know. It can lead to forgetfulness, disorientation, a craving for carbs, depression and headaches, not to mention overworking your systems to break-down point. But did you know that depriving your body of enough sleep can slow down and even stop the weight loss process?

One of the many reasons for this is that your sleep-deprived body releases more of a hormone called cortisol, a stress hormone that causes your body to have food cravings. Sleep deprivation can also cause elevated blood sugar levels, which can cause an insulin response that makes your body store fat.

Furthermore, human growth hormone, which orchestrates the repair and rebuilding of all your cells, is released during deep sleep, but if you do not get enough sleep, this doesn't take place and your body stores more fat without properly repairing itself, leading to weight gain and premature aging.

Maximum fat burning occurs between your last meal (before 8 p.m.) and breakfast, because it takes your body about 2,000 calories of energy to rejuvenate and repair itself while you sleep.

This is one more reason it's important to try to improve your sleep habits and give your body the opportunity to be its best.

A Zareinu dilemma: choose only one

Guest Voice

By MITCH PARKER
Special to The CJN

In this period of national elections in both the United States and Canada, analysts often talk about the Jewish vote. As part of this discussion, the question is frequently raised, "Is Judaism a nationality or a religion?"

For us only among the major faiths, the answer is clear and obvious: it is both. Judaism is a faith-based system with beliefs, practices and ideologies, and at the same time, it is nationality-based with regard to lineage, customs and culture.

It is interesting that since I began my tenure in March at the Zareinu Educational Centre for children with special needs, a similar question has often been asked about this institution? Is Zareinu a school or a therapeutic centre? Is our primary purpose to educate our students or to provide them with therapeutic services?

I believe that, for children at least, the question is meaningless, as there is little practical difference between the two. The goals of education are to impart information, to promote growth and to encourage transition from one developmental stage to another. Therapy with children, whether speech, music, occupational or physio, is intended also to impart information, to promote growth and encourage transition from one developmental stage to another.

I think most people believe that education is something provided to the healthy, while therapy is something offered to those who are in some ways not whole or broken.

The one is a natural and normative process; the other is primarily rehabilitative. In actuality, education promotes language development (English and language arts), fine and gross motor skill acquisition (physical education) and fine art appreciation (music and art), just as therapy does. Education, for most children, may progress more quickly than therapy does. Education may not require the same level of highly specialized professional expertise as therapy does, but the goals of each are nearly identical. A teacher is a therapist just as a therapist is a teacher.

So, is Zareinu a school or a therapy centre? The answer, we are proud to proclaim, is that we are both. Upon entering a Zareinu class, one sees teachers and therapists working together, each supporting the goals and the efforts of the other. In a well-run class, one cannot tell which is which. Clearly, the prime beneficiaries of this melding of roles are the students, whose development is being promoted across disciplines throughout the day in a natural, context-based milieu.

Zareinu also rests on a third pillar that brings us back full circle. Zareinu is a school, Zareinu is a therapy centre, and Zareinu is Jewish. Throughout the school day, our students learn about Jewish customs, they study Hebrew and they learn about mitzvot. Judaism, for them, is also the substrate within which other skills are acquired. Tzedakah is not only giving charity. Tzedakah becomes the medium in which language skills, number concepts, fine and gross motor skills and social skills are acquired.

Everyone at all of the Zareinus wishes you a Gmar Chatimah Tovah – may you be sealed for a good year.

Mitch Parker is the principal and clinical director of Zareinu Educational Centre in Thornhill, Ont.

PRIME MINISTER PREMIER MINISTRE

It is with great pleasure that I extend greetings to everyone taking part in Holocaust Education Week 2008.

Events like this are vital to preserving and honouring the memory of the victims and survivors of the Shoah, one of the greatest crimes in human history. More than 60 years have passed since the world became aware of the unimaginable atrocities perpetrated on more than six million European Jews and other victims, yet vigilance and remembrance are essential. Unfortunately, hatred and bigotry have not gone away. Free and democratic societies such as Canada have an obligation to speak out when individuals are persecuted because of their race, ethnicity or religion.

Now in its 28th year, Holocaust Education Week presents a vast array of informative and educational programs aimed at heightening awareness of the Holocaust and of its devastating impact on the world, including the rare opportunity to hear from those who experienced its horrors first-hand. I would like to commend all those associated with the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto, as well as this week's guest speakers, for their crucial role in ensuring that our children and future generations learn the lessons of the past. I am certain that everyone involved will come away with a sense of hope for the future, and a renewed commitment to the fight against anti-Semitism, racism, and intolerance in all its forms.

On behalf of the Government of Canada, please accept my best wishes for a successful week.

The Rt. Hon. Stephen Harper, P.C., M.P.

Premier of Ontario / Première ministre de l'Ontario

November 2 – 9, 2008

A Personal Message from the Premier

On behalf of the Government of Ontario, I wish to extend warm greetings to everyone participating in the 28th annual Holocaust Education Week, organized by the Holocaust Centre of Toronto and the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

For more than a quarter-century, Holocaust Education Week has provided Ontarians with an ideal opportunity to reflect on one of the darkest moments in human history, and to renew our resolve to ensure that it never happens again. It is also an opportunity to remember those who perished in the Holocaust and to honour those who survived it.

The Holocaust serves as a compelling reminder of our obligation — as a society and as individuals — to learn from the lessons of history, to be vigilant against all forms of hatred and intolerance, and to embrace inclusiveness and diversity — in the laws of our land and in our hearts. I commend everyone taking part in the Holocaust Education Week program for your commitment to building an Ontario imbued with the values of tolerance, respect and understanding — a place where we protect the rights and dignity of every citizen.

I would like to thank the hard-working organizers and volunteers with the Holocaust Centre of Toronto and the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto for devoting time and energy to making education week possible.

Please accept my best wishes.

TRAUMA: THE PSYCHOLOGICAL IMPACT OF POLITICAL VIOLENCE/ GENOCIDE AND ITS TREATMENT

The targeting of civilians has often been the objective and a tactic of war. New Canadians have been exposed and have had their families and communities affected by violence, experiencing trauma, loss and grief. Holocaust survivors and their children have been among those who have struggled to begin to understand the impact of trauma, coping and adaptation in order to help the victims settle and recover. DR. SPEAKING OF HATE: A SURVIVOR'S EXPERIENCES AND THE PSYCHOLOGY OF HATE-MOTIVATED CRIMES

ESTHER BEM survived the Holocaust after escaping as a young child with her parents from Nazi-held Zagreb, Croatia. Evading the Ustasa village "authorities" was often a matter of life and death. They survived hiding in plain sight, with the help of "righteous" Aryan Christians, the term used to describe those who risked their own lives to save Jews. Esther's story is one of her struggle and the triumph of human progress.

NAZI DOCTORS AND THE HOLOCAUST

Nazi Germany's state-created racism and anti-Semitism provided the ground for the evil that [illegible] become active participants in the Nazi eugenics program. Nazi physicians played a [illegible] selecting victims for extermination in death camps, they determined who would live and who would die and established what was tolerable to those who were not immediately killed, including horrific human experimentation. FROM THE HOLOCAUST TO DARFUR: LESSONS FROM THE PAST AND A CALL FOR RESPONSIBLE SOCIAL ACTION

What are the lessons to be learned after the Holocaust? In light of the ongoing genocide and human rights abuses of the 20th and 21st centuries, what is the meaning of Never Again? MAJOR BRENT BEARDSLEY, drawing from his own experiences, will speak to these important questions. His powerful presentation, asking us to take action against injustice, is a sobering call that we cannot ignore.

Major Beardsley, M.S.C., C.D., is an Infantry Officer in The Royal Canadian Regiment of the Canadian Army with 26 years of service. He served as part of the United Nations Assistance Mission in Rwanda (UNAMIR) before, during, and after the genocide in 1994 as the Operations Manager for Canadian General Roméo Dallaire, the Force Commander. THE COUNTERFEITERS

In this 2007 Academy Award-winning Austrian/German Best Foreign Language film writer/director Stefan Ruzowitzky explores the moral corrosion of Nazi complicity in this tightly wound adaptation of Adolf Burger's fact-based book The Devil's Workshop. During the last years of WWII, as the German Reich saw that the end was near, the authorities decided to produce their own banknotes in the currencies of their major war enemies, hoping to destabilize the enemy economy and fill the Reich's empty war coffers. At the Sachsenhausen Concentration Camp, two barracks were transformed into a fully equipped counterfeiters workshop. "Operation Bernhard" was born. Prisoners were brought from other camps: professional printers, fastidious bank officials and simple craftsmen all became members of the top-secret counterfeiter unit. If they cooperated with the enemy, they had a chance to survive; if they sabotaged the operation, a sure death awaited them. LARRY ANKLEWICZ, Program Coordinator for the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, will introduce the film, and RABBI WAYNE ALLEN will comment on the moral issues involved. (Rated R, some strong violence, brief sexuality/nudity and coarse language.)

NEUROETHICS: THE ETHICS OF FORGETTING PAINFUL MEMORIES

Neuroethics is a burgeoning field involving innovative neuroscientific technologies and practices. Fears of dementia, particularly Alzheimer's Disease, have driven the research and application of innovative pharmaceuticals, brain imaging devices to either arrest memory decline, or, preferably, to enhance memory abilities. Flying in the face of the current sensibility is the drive to discover methods to either prevent the development or storage of memories, to mitigate their emotional effects, to distort memories and even to erase memories. While the scientific advancements are experimental, at the present, we must consider the ethical implications involved. MARCIA SOKOLOWSKI, B.A. Dip.C.S. M.A., Ph.D.(C), is the clinical ethicist at Baycrest and the University of Toronto Joint Centre for Bioethics, and interim ethicist at Bloorview MacMillan Children's Centre. Her Ph.D. dissertation (in progress) addresses the ethical issues surrounding use of advanced directives with people with dementia. Recommended for health care professionals. The public is welcome.

THE NEIGHBOUR'S SON

Born in Klingenberg, Germany LIESEL APPEL graduated from Teachers Training College in Ulm/Donau at 17 to become a nursery school teacher. The daughter of Hitler's Minister of Education in Poland, she lived her past by marrying her fiancé, a German. Her book is a new identity for her three children, including Gisela, "the African who saved herself with rotten apples." Since 1961 she has lived in the U.S. She travelled to Israel in 1999.

Ms. Appel has touched the lives of many people through her books and lectures. Her mission is to achieve a small measure of justice for her former Jewish neighbours. She looks at the issues of German redemption, contemplating whether any reparation can be earned for past crimes, denial of wrongdoing while proclaiming that blanket forgiveness cannot be achieved. Maintaining that the evil committed by the German people – her people – is a built mass of that multitude of good deeds / attempts to sanitize mass murder, she suggests that forgiveness must be sought from the specific person who was wronged. To this end, she is desperately searching for her neighbours son, Edgar August Meyer, of Brittrup, Germany. In this presentation she will discuss her book, her journey, and her personal connection to Holocaust education.

At the centre of it all is Paul Beck, a young lawyer whose chance meeting with a visiting Swede, Raoul Wallenberg, may alter the inevitability of the Jews' fate. FROM HATE TO HOPE: A HATE CRIME PERPETRATOR AND HIS VICTIM COME TOGETHER

Twenty years ago MATTHEW BOGER was a young teenage runaway who was thrown out of his house by his mother at the age of 13 because he disclosed he was gay. He now works as a manager at the Museum of Tolerance in Los Angeles. TIM ZAAL was a former neo-Nazi and a former hate crime perpetrator. He now speaks of his past experiences at the Museum as part of the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Task Force Against Hate.

Two men from very different backgrounds were drawn to the Wiesenthal Center because of their individual commitments to speak out against intolerance. Over time they discovered that Tim, the former neo-Nazi, had once beaten the gay man, Matthew, so badly that he had to be hospitalized. The discovery of this eerie connection, as well as their common goal of educating people, especially students, about the dangers of intolerance, stereotyping and hatred, inspired this unlikely duo to team up to share their meaningful and powerful message. Their story is one of remarkable reconciliation between the perpetrator and the victim of a hate crime.

COMPLETING THE CIRCLE: HONOURING THE PAST, PRAYING FOR THE FUTURE

Some survivors of the Holocaust, while making a new life for themselves and their children, cannot bring themselves to speak of those cataclysmic times, nor think of revisiting their ancestral homes, the cities and shtetls of Europe that once teemed with the richness of Jewish life and culture. Others feel they must go back – whether it is to remember a way of life, honour those who were murdered, or to acknowledge how their lives and the lives of others were irrevocably changed. Members of a panel, representing three generations, will speak about their experiences, what compelled them to return to Poland and to the concentration and death camps, and why it was essential for them to make that difficult journey, to bear witness, to truly understand where they came from, and where they will go in the future.

BERNIE FARBER, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, a Jewish advocacy organization addressing issues of community relations, public policy and public and media relations, will moderate. A recognized expert on antisemitism and human rights, Mr. Farber is a child of Holocaust survivors.

EPHRAIM FIKSEL, a member of Beth Torah's Board of Trustees, is a child of survivors who has returned to his parents' home city in Poland twice and is currently the President of the Chenstochover Aid Society.

JEWISH STRATEGIES FOR SURVIVAL, 1939-1941

Jews in Europe faced terrible challenges in the early years of WWII, even before the first killing centres began operating in late 1941. The defeat and division of Poland by the Germans and Soviet Union in September 1939 brought millions of Jews into Nazi hands, creating particular forms of vulnerability even for those who managed to flee to the East. The fall of France in June 1940 closed another means of escape. Shoved into ghettos, their livelihoods and property stolen, Jews were increasingly isolated from their gentile neighbours and pitted against one another. Still, European Jews were anything but passive. Some found ways to escape Europe, some went into hiding, some passed as gentiles. They used whatever resources they could muster – job skills, wealth, connections, good looks – to try to find ways to get around the mountain of restrictions and violence directed against them. This lecture by PROFESSOR DORIS BERGEN uses personal accounts to present and analyze some of the Jewish responses to persecution and destruction in the early stages of the Holocaust. Recommended for college/university students and educators. The general public is welcome.

DEMOCIDE: MASS MURDER IN THE 20TH CENTURY – AND BEYOND

Most people are familiar with the concept of genocide – the murder of an entire people. Democide, a term coined by political scientist R. J. Rummel, is much broader. It refers to the murder, mass detention of persons by a government, and includes government measures such as genocide, the Holocaust and the genocide in Rwanda, mass murder (Ukrainian famine in the 1930s), and the murder of individuals whom the state views as political enemies. Democide has claimed over 150 million lives in the 20th century. Yet, when another episode occurs, many people refuse to accept the initial reports. It seems to ignore the emerging atrocity. Terrorism expert JOHN THOMPSON, Director of The Mackenzie Institute, will examine the concept of democide, providing an overview of 20th century current and looming crises.

THE NEW ANTISEMITISM AND WHAT TO DO ABOUT IT

Antisemitism is on the rise. It is a global phenomenon conveyed in the digital age by Internet, e-mail, television and video. What can we do about it? What is the role of Holocaust education in this effort?

MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS DURING THE HOLOCAUST

The bond between mother and daughter is one of the most basic human connections: even a man is some woman's daughter. What happened to mother-daughter relations among Jewish women and girls under the severe pressures of the Shoah? This presentation will use personal accounts (interviews, memoirs, and letters) to examine the ways women and families attempted as targets of persecution, in ghettos, in hiding, in partisan groups, in concentration camps and killing centres. Could family ties help women survive as has often been claimed? Did the Nazi onslaught attack mother-daughter relations as a way to destroy Jewish solidarity? PROFESSOR DORIS BERGEN will address these issues. The film The Bielski Brothers explores the story of the largest group of Jewish partisans in WWII who fought against the Nazi occupiers and their collaborators in the area of present-day Belarus. The group was initially organized by the four Bielski brothers, who fled to the nearby forest after their parents and other family members were killed in 1941. FROM HIDDEN CHILD TO INTERNATIONAL JURY MEMBER: AN ARCHITECT'S PERSONAL CONNECTION TO THE NEW HOLOCAUST MUSEUM OF BELGIUM

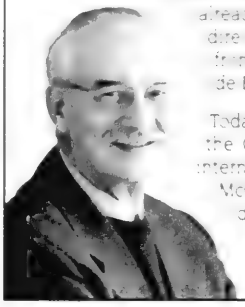
PROFESSOR ADRIAN SHEPPARD, FRAIC, B. Arch., M. Arch., was a Hidden Child in Belgium during WWII. Both his parents were deported to Auschwitz after being interned at Caserne Dossin, an old army barracks located in Mechelen, Malines. Professor Sheppard was hidden by Carl de Brouwer, a prosperous banker who lived in a large country estate outside of Ghent. He had five children of his own and had already taken in a 12-year-old Jewish child whose parents were also in hiding. Aware of the dire consequences were they to be found, the de Brouwers hid Adrian and protected him from deportation. The Yad Vashem Institute in Jerusalem posthumously awarded the de Brouwers the title of "Righteous Among the Nations" in 2000.



Today, the Belgian government proposes to build a Holocaust museum adjacent to the Caserne. Professor Sheppard was invited to participate in the adjudication of the international architectural competition for the design. He is a Professor of Architecture at McGill University in Montreal and President of the Comité d'architecture et d'urbanisme de Montréal, which oversees all major planning and architectural projects in the city.

HOLOCAUST SURVIVORS: THE FORGOTTEN HEROES

The heroism of Holocaust survivors who did not rebel in the ghettos and did not fight in the woods has not always been celebrated nor recognized either by monuments or by words. The survivors of the Holocaust are a living symbol of the history of the Jews. Jews have survived not by resisting their persecutors but by adapting and enduring. Courage to endure deserves at least the same recognition as courage to engage in suicidal resistance.

In this award-winning documentary, 13-year-old Eric Strom, his family, and their female Reform Rabbi travel to Cracow, Poland to celebrate Eric's Bar Mitzvah - the first such ceremony held there since the Holocaust. Directed by Oren Rudavsky and narrated by actor Eli Wallach, this landmark film deals with the Holocaust, cultural survival and the tension between Orthodox and contemporary religious movements. Following the film, RABBI EMILY FAUST KORZENIK, who invited the Strom family, arranged the trip to Poland and accompanied them, will share her experiences. The Strom family, along with Ed Blonder, their guide, translator and a survivor of Auschwitz-Birkenau, created a joyful event for the elderly Jews who remained in Cracow. Rabbi Korzenik is Rabbi Emerita of the Stamford Connecticut Synagogue Fellowship for Jewish Learning, serving the congregation from 1978-2003. In addition, she served as President of the Stamford Greenwich Board of Rabbis between 2002-2003. She is a recipient of the Hannah G. Solomon Award of the Council of Jewish Women, Stamford Section.

ESCAPING HELL IN TREBLINKA

Oskar Strawczynski and his brother Zygmunt were two of fewer than 60 inmates who survived the Treblinka death camp. Taking part in a rebellion, they escaped from the camp and were later separated in the forest. Oskar, who fought with the partisans, was urged to write about his experiences while in the underground resistance movement.

His memoir is one of the earliest written eyewitness accounts of the August 2, 1943 uprising in Treblinka. The two brothers reconnected through the publication of their story and both testified at the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials. Originally written in Yiddish, the memoir was translated by Oskar's sister Natalie (Strawczynski) Rotter and edited by his niece Frederika Rotter. Escaping Hell in Treblinka was first published in Montreal by the Canadian Jewish Archives, and most recently by the Yad Vashem Holocaust Survivors' Memoir Project in New York and Jerusalem. Guest speaker FREDERIKA ROTTER will provide the background for her uncle's poignant story of the brutality of daily life in the forced labour camp. The program will also include readings from the memoir in English and in the original Yiddish.

SUGIHARA: CONSPIRACY OF KINDNESS

Chiune (Sempo) Sugihara was a Japanese diplomat serving as Vice Consul in Lithuania. Soon after the occupation of Lithuania by the Soviet Union, he helped several thousand Jews leave the country by issuing transit visas allowing them to travel to Japan. Most of the Jews who escaped were refugees from Poland or residents of Lithuania. Sugihara was awarded the title "Righteous Among the Nations" by Yad Vashem in Israel.

Holocaust survivor FAIGIE LIBMAN was born in Kaunas (Kovno), Lithuania, where Sugihara was posted. As a young child, she and her mother lived in the Kovno Ghetto and were later transferred to the Stutthof Concentration Camp before being liberated by the Soviet Red Army. She lived in a Displaced Persons camp in Austria, and came to Canada in 1948. A brief segment from the documentary Sugihara: Conspiracy of Kindness will be shown, followed by Faigie's personal testimony.

AN INSIDER'S VIEW OF THE ART OF DISSENT

An insider's view of this exhibition with ANGELIKA LITTLEFIELD

Writer, curator and editor Angie Littlefield spent 33 years in the field of education. As Executive Director of the Durham West Arts Centre from 2003-2007, she curated The Thomsons of Durham: Tom Thomson's Family Heritage. She is currently writing two monologue plays: Late Works of Tom Thomson for the McMichael Gallery for 2009 and Walking with Oma for 2010. The latter work about her Jewish grandmother's life interweaves the narrative of her grandmother walking from the Theresienstadt Concentration Camp to Hamburg in 1946 with her own experiences of walking the same 700+ km along the Elbe River in the spring of 2008.

The Art of Dissent is generously co-sponsored by Joseph Gottdenker, in memory of the members of the Gottdenker and Zuckerbrot families, who perished during the Holocaust and those who miraculously survived but have since passed away.

RESCUERS IN THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE AND THE HOLOCAUST

As the Ottoman Turkish government was rounding up the Armenians in the Empire for mass deportation and slaughter in 1915, a number of Turks and other Muslims risked their lives to help them escape certain death. Years later, as the Nazis were rounding up the Jews throughout Europe, a brave few risked their lives to help Jews escape annihilation. Among them were a small number of Armenians officially recognized as Righteous Among the Nations. This lecture will describe the activities of these rescuers, highlighting a unique, interesting and reassuring aspect of the human potential for courage and humanity.

RICHARD G. HOVANNISIAN is Professor of Armenian and Near Eastern History and Armenian Educational Foundation Chair in Modern Armenian History at the University of California, Los Angeles (UCLA). PAPER CLIPS

This film documents how students in Whitwell, Tennessee responded to lessons about the Holocaust – with a promise to honour those murdered by collecting one paper clip for every life lost. As a result, a memorial railcar filled with eleven million paper clips, representing 6 million Jews and 5 million gypsies, homosexuals and others, stands permanently as their school's shocking example of how students and educators can change the world one classroom at a time.

JESSICA TAYLOR, Birthright and March of the Living alumna, will introduce the Paperclips Unity Project, inspired by the Whitwell experience and speak about the importance of young adult involvement in supporting social responsibility initiatives. SID ROCHWERG, Co-Chair of the Ride to Remember and member of Yiddish on Wheels (YOW), will speak about the club's memorial motorcycle ride to Whitwell and, more recently, to the Goodwin Learning Centre in Trenton, Ontario, where students are collecting 6 million pebbles in memory of those who perished. *Seating is limited. Livni opposes Olmert's peace plan

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni told her French counterpart Bernard Kouchner that in principle she opposes the agreement that outgoing Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has offered Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

"I do not believe in far-reaching proposals and an attempt to expedite matters, especially in light of the political situation," Livni, the prime minister-designate, told Kouchner on Sunday.

That morning, Kouchner had met with Olmert, who said he was frustrated that Abbas had not accepted his proposal. "You've read what I said in the interview," Olmert told Kouchner, referring to his statements in Yediot Achronot favouring Israeli withdrawal from east Jerusalem and the Golan Heights. "Still, the Palestinians do not want to sign."

Kouchner raised the matter later when he met with Livni and asked why she objects to Olmert's proposal. Olmert's plan proposes a comprehensive solution on borders and refugees, and postpones a decision on Jerusalem.

Livni's explanation was a criticism of Olmert. "[Abbas] in his present political situation cannot accept such an agreement," she said. "The political situation in Israel also does not allow it to be signed."

Livni also argued that blaming the Palestinians for refusing to accept Olmert's offer does no good. "We can say this is their fault – but what will that do?" she said. "We had the same thing after Camp David in 2000 and look where that got us."

Earlier Sunday, in her first foreign policy address since winning the Kadima party primary last month, Livni voiced her commitment to continue peace negotiations with the Palestinians.

"Annapolis will continue," Livni said, referring to a U.S.-sponsored peace conference last November that restarted negotiations on the establishment of a Palestinian state.

"Let us not allow dates or political changes to stand in our way," she said, in her address to a Foreign Ministry conference on policy and strategy in Jerusalem.

"The point is to understand the required concessions in order to conduct a correct process," Livni said.

Sunday's conference marked the first of what are to be annual assessments of Israel's foreign policy. It was attended by Palestinian Foreign Minister Riyad al-Malki.

Bahrain wants Iran, Israel in regional club

JTA

LONDON — Bahrain has called for the establishment of a Middle Eastern association that would include Israel and Iran.

"Why don't we all sit together, even if we have differences, and even if we don't recognize each other?" Sheikh Khalid bin Ahmed al-Khalifa told the London-based, Arabic-language daily Al-Hayat, according to a report in Thursday's Guardian newspaper. "Why not become one organization?"

He said Israel should be a member, together with Iran and Turkey. "This is the only way to solve our problems."

Bahrain, an island nation across the Persian Gulf from Iran, has for years resisted Iranian efforts to intervene in its politics. Both nations have Shiite Muslim majorities.

Bahrain leans toward the West and has low-level ties with Israel. The Bahraini royal family, which is encouraging democratization, recently appointed a Jewish woman as ambassador to Washington, a first in the Arab world.

Triplets raise $30,000 for Sunnybrook NICU

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

As they gazed at the babies in Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre's neonatal intensive care unit (NICU), Amanda, Samantha and Jake Wolfe truly understood the impact of their tzedakah.

"When we were in the NICU, we got such great care," Amanda said.

"So we really wanted to give back, to make sure other babies get the same care that we got."

As part of celebrating their bar and bat mitzvahs, the triplets decided to ask their guests to donate money for renovations and upgrades to the same nursery that they themselves had spent time in 13 years ago.

Originally aiming to raise $5,000, the trio managed to garner an exceptional $30,000. The funds are being used to pay for 32 bassinets in the new NICU.

"We were amazed by how much we raised," said Amanda, who like her siblings, is a Grade 8 student at Windfields Junior High School in Toronto.

As impressive as the trio's donation is, their own birth story at Sunnybrook was also quite a gift for everyone involved.

When Beverley Wolfe went into labour five months into her pregnancy, doctors and nurses did everything they could to delay her delivery so that the babies could develop as fully as possible.

Beverley would spend the next 12 weeks resting in bed at the hospital, and the triplets were born on Dec. 28, 1994.

"Even the doctors and nurses said it was amazing that we were able to hold off on delivering for so long," Beverley said.

Beverley and her husband, Michael, first talked with the kids about the idea of making tzedakah part of their bar and bat mitzvahs while they were planning the affair.

"We brought up the idea of giving some part of their gifts to charity," Michael said.

"The timing was such that Sunnybrook needed equipment for the new NICU, and when the kids learned about that, they were very excited."

As money flowed in well beyond their expectations, the triplets were very pleased and realized that they were within reach of paying for all of the bassinets required.

To hit the target, they enlisted the support of their aunt, who arranged a fundraiser – a movie screening at Yorkdale.

Friends and family bought tickets to a preview of Journey to the Center of the Earth, and with the added funds from ticket sales, the final total raised was $30,317.

While the hospital is extremely happy about the donation, mom and dad are also beaming with pride.

"We are proud of them all the time, but even more so with this endeavour," says Michael.

"They got behind this and really embraced it."

Recently, the triplets went to Sunnybrook to deliver their gift, and to pay their first visit to the NICU since their birth.

"It was really amazing to see the babies," Samantha said. "It helped us see how important [the donation] is."

With the 10 Commandments behind them, four political candidates debated each other – sometimes heatedly – Sunday night on the bimah at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

On the eve of the last day for observant Jewish voters to take advantage of advance polling, Tory Jason Kenney, secretary of state for multiculturalism and Canadian identity; Liberal Joe Volpe, the incumbent in Lawrence-Eglinton; Rosemary Frei, Green party candidate for York Centre, and Susan Wallace, New Democratic Party candidate for Willowdale, gathered to discuss some of the pressing issues for the Jewish community and shed more light on their parties' policies on Israel.

Moderated by local journalist Naomi Parness and organized by the Canadian Jewish Political Action Committee (CJPAC), candidates took written questions from the audience of approximately 150 people and were given one minute to respond directly and then another 45 seconds to rebut their colleagues remarks.

In his opening remarks, Kenney thanked the other candidates for attending, but he tried to downplay the presence of the NDP and Greens, saying there are really only two "main" choices in this election, the Liberals and his Conservatives. It was a sentiment he expressed again later on when he predicted that both the Green party and NDP would "never have to worry" about balancing the country's budget.

Kenney then recited a list of actions his government has taken to show support for Jews and Israel, including being the first country to pull out of the upcoming followup to the 2001 World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, – known as Durban II – and for its consistent support for Israel over the last two years.

Volpe countered that his party's "long-standing" position on Israel meant that the Jewish state has "never had a better friend" in Canada than the Liberals.

Election coverage woes

From the editor's desk

The timing of this federal election posed a number of challenges for The CJN in terms of providing the very best coverage we could in the condensed campaign period that fell squarely within the High Holidays. The main complicator for the paper was the fact that the High Holidays significantly truncated the production schedules for the two issues immediately prior to the election, including, of course, this one.

The policy of the paper – at least for the past 38 years – is not to editorially endorse one political party over another. Rather, we have always urged readers to vote according to conscience.

Only during the Quebec unity referenda did the paper effectively endorse one party over an other. But in those instances, the editorial choices were driven by the importance of the cause and not by the individuality, strengths or weaknesses of the respective leaders. The endorsement of the pro-federalism party was the indirect result of the endorsement of the pro-federalism cause.

We assiduously strive to achieve maximum, transparent fairness in our election coverage.

Nevertheless, we understand that our efforts will not always match up with the perception of some of our readers, who, viewing our coverage through the prism of their partisan loyalties, may draw opposite conclusions about our attempt at fairness.

Some readers measure and compare the inches of space allocated among the candidates in the riding profile stories. Some comment on the ordering and placement of the candidate quotes. Some comment on the placement of the photos, where candidate photos accompany the story.

We do our best to ensure the fairness of our coverage.

Given the pressures of time and space, most readers will agree that we generally succeed.

Sometimes however situations arise where the appearance of fairness may be compromised.

Two such situations arose last week, and they require explanation.

Readers will notice that among the letters to the editor, we published Rosh Hashanah greetings from Prime Minister Stephen Harper. No other leader was afforded such treatment. Some people thought our decision was unfair to the other leaders.

Two factors motivated our decision. The first was that such greetings to the community from the head of the national government are intrinsically worthy of publication, despite the fact that they were sent during an election campaign.

The second was the fact we received greetings from no other leader before deadline. After the paper had already gone to press, we did receive greetings from Liberal Leader Stéphane Dion. But by then, it was too late to publish them. His greetings appear in the web edition of the paper.

Readers will also notice that we published an interview with only one party leader, namely, Elizabeth May. The reason for this is simply because the Green party head was the only one who responded to our requests for an interview.

Running for the first time as a leader of a party in a federal election, it makes sense that May wanted to introduce herself to our readers – to explain herself, her actions and her policies.

As of Oct. 6, our press date for this issue, none of the other leaders was able to set aside the time to meet with the paper. Of course, all of them have appeared in The CJN in the past.

Moreover, two of the leaders, Harper and Dion, have held political rallies during this campaign specifically with Jewish audiences.

Harper's rally was held early in the campaign in Toronto. Dion's rally was held in Winnipeg two weeks ago. Both rallies were reported upon in the paper.

The story reporting upon the Winnipeg rally appeared in the paper last week. It evoked a very strongly worded, angry accusation of bias against the paper from a cabinet minister in Harper's government.

A message on my voice mail awaited me upon my return to the office after the Rosh Hashanah holiday.

The minister was upset, complaining emphatically about the fact that there were a number of omissions in the story. The story did not contain statements made previously by Dion that the minister alleged were inconsistent with the positions put forward by Dion at the rally. The caller was angry with what was referred to as constant bias by The CJN.

Had the caller left a return phone number, I would have called to point out the story was a news report of the event of the rally: what was said and what was the reaction. It was neither commentary nor analysis.

In that sense, I would have said, it replicated the type of news reporting that appeared in the paper of the community rally held earlier in the election campaign with Harper in Toronto.

I would have reiterated to the minister that The CJN strives for fairness. That we are not always perceived to be fair is one of the many woes with which we must cope during the heat of an election campaign.

WYE NOT TRY?

In October 1998, then-U.S. president Bill Clinton, centre, brought then-Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, right, and Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, left, together at Wye River Plantation in Maryland for talks to implement the outstanding issues of the 1993 Oslo accords. After many days of intensive negotiations, the leaders signed an agreement at the White House on Oct. 23. A visibly ill King Hussein of Jordan, second from left, had joined the talks from his home in Amman on Oct. 17. At the White House ceremony, Arafat made the following statement: "We are fully committed to whatever is required from us to achieve real security and constant peace for every Israeli person and for the Israeli people... I will do everything I can so that no Israeli mother will be worried if her son or daughter is late coming home." Arafat's subsequent behaviour proved that he had prevaricated.

Magen David Adom: Israel's 911 since 1930

- The backbone of MDA is its amazing corps of more than 10,000 volunteers, 4,000 of them ages 15 to 18, who donate 1 million hours per year.
- MDA volunteers, decorated on numerous occasions, are especially effective in multi-casualty incidents when they are among the first to arrive on the scene to assist medical teams in treating and evacuating casualties.
- The Sido family is exemplary of the spirit of volunteerism. Father, Chaggai, with his eldest son, Eliran, and daughter, Natalie, 20, have worked many shifts together in MDA ambulances. In August 2007, they received a call for an elderly man suffering from a very high fever at his home. The man they saved turned out to be the grandfather of the Sido children!

Durban II will damage Israel, prof says

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Durban II is a major threat to Israel, York University political science professor Anne Bayefsky says.

The United Nations' Durban Review Conference, planned for April 2009 as a follow-up to the 2001 UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, is expected to be rife with anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment, just like the first one, she told a Sept. 18 audience at Beth Tikvah Synagogue in a lecture titled "The Durban II Nightmare," one of two talks given at the event.

Bayefsky, who is also the editor of EYEontheUN.org, showed a film she made featuring the anti-Semitic placards and propaganda that were prominent at the first Durban conference.

The film showed many anti-Semitic signs and hundreds of people wearing shirts with the slogans "Zionism is racism," and "Apartheid Is-real" [sic]. Bayefsky said the proliferation of these messages and their sheer repetition lends credibility to these fallacies and contributes to Israel's image problem on the international stage.

In addition a string of anti-Israel and anti-Semitic declarations, accompanied by hate-filled protests, hijacked the conference, she said.

"It was a racist anti-racist conference that anti-Semites took full advantage of."

The same kind of images, rhetoric and propaganda are expected at next year's forum, to be held in Geneva, she said, adding that they are reminiscent of those propagated in Nazi Germany. "The lessons of the Holocaust have never been learned."

Iran, Pakistan and Egypt are preparing to draft a declaration branding Israel as racist, she said.

South Africa, Bayefsky said, refused to host the 2009 conference because of the issues that arose in 2001. The American and Israeli representatives walked out at the time, although Canada stayed.

This time, however, the Canadian government, in anticipation of the upcoming conference's likely bias, declared last January that it would not participate, she said.

Bayefsky, who is also a member of the International Law Association committee on international human rights law and practice, hopes that, with enough advocacy in the coming months, other democratic countries will follow Canada's lead in boycotting the summit, which she said is expected to host many Holocaust deniers and human rights violators who want to see Israel destroyed.

The United Nations isn't to be trusted to fight injustice, she added. Six of the emergency sessions in its history were specific to Israel, while not one was called to deal with the Rwanda and Sudanese genocides.

"One-fifth of Israelis are Arabs with more rights than anywhere in the Arab world. Arab states have made their states Judenrein [free of Jews]. Almost nothing Israel does, according to the UN, is perceived as legitimate. The criticism it receives and standards it is expected to hold are applied nowhere else."

Bayefsky was preceded by Aryeh Green, director of Media Central in Jerusalem, who discussed how the media are influenced when reporting on Israel and how journalists interpret the situation in the Middle East.

Green rebuked Toronto's Citytv for its Aug. 14 broadcast about clashes at a construction site in the West Bank between pro-Palestinian protesters and Israeli soldiers. The report, by Citytv host Gord Martineau, said that 11 Palestinians were killed. In fact, no deaths occurred, Green said.

HonestReporting Canada called attention to the error, and says the correction offered was terse and insufficient.

Such misinformation coupled with ignorance is a double battle that has to be fought, Green said. "There is a lack of understanding among foreign journalists about Israel."

Most reporters stationed in the Middle East, he noted, have been parachuted in with little or no knowledge of the history, facts or context of the conflict. "They weren't told that Palestinian leaders goaded, led and were encouraging violence in September 2000."

As a result, a new form of information-gathering took shape.

Palestinian media liaisons have welcomed journalists with open arms for 30 years, Green said, befriending them and meeting with them, thus successfully swaying and influencing their reports.

"As a result, so many in the media have adopted a pro-Palestinian slant." This is important, he said, because "bureaucrats and UN leaders learn from the media."

Green decided to borrow the idea, and recalled an example of inviting a certain journalist – known to be a harsh critic of Israel – to his backyard barbecue and on a wine tour. That journalist soon afterward became an advocate to help Green call attention to a problematic report on Israel.

"Journalists are given information ad nauseum. We criticize so shrilly [that] it's often ignored," he said.

Instead, Green said he takes cues from Dale Carnegie's book How to Win Friends and Influence People. "First make friends, then you can influence them."

In the session's introductory remarks, Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general in Toronto, spoke of a similar kind of diplomacy on Israel's behalf.

"The image [of Israel] is problematic in the world," he said. "It is a burden on our national security. Your influence can make things better. We are all ambassadors to convince others that we are right in what we do."

The evening's sponsors were the Speakers Action Group, Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University and Beth Tikvah Synagogue, with co-sponsors One Family Fund Canada, Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association, International Christian Embassy Jerusalem Canada, HonestReporting Canada and Christians United for Israel – Canada.

Shared values means Israel is not alone

History – ancient, medieval, modern and the spaces in between – has taught the Jewish People to be wary. Alas, in every generation, someone or some group has sought to do us harm. Indeed just last month, the current avatar of Jew-harmers, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, again frothed his foamy hatred of Israel and the Jewish People from the rostrum of the UN General Assembly. The constant Jewish concern, if not also obsession, for Israel's security is therefore quite understandable.

But sometimes in our overall wariness and worry for the future, we neglect to take proper note of the fact that Israel has many friends in the world, some of whom are very close at hand. It is especially important that we set aside a moment to note these friends and friendships well.

For example, as reported in The CJN last week, Quebec has just concluded an agreement with Israel that will promote trade, investment and collaboration in sectors such as biotechnology, aerospace and the environment. This new agreement complements an existing agreement between the two jurisdictions in the areas of culture, education and science.

Economic Development Minister Raymond Bachand led some 40 Quebec businesspeople on a four-day mission to the Jewish state last month. He was clearly impressed and even, it seems, inspired by what he saw. "Israel and Quebec maintain solid ties that are based on a common vision and and objectives… Quebec must not only maintain, but also increase, its relations and collaboration with this country whose expertise is diverse and amazing," Bachand said.

The minister insisted upon visiting Yad Vashem. "It was very important for me to go to Yad Vashem to meditate in this place and to show the full sympathy of the Quebec people for this great tragedy." Could there be a more poignant, more cutting refutation of the ignorant fulminations of the Iranian president?

In the same vein, as also reported in last week's CJN, the Manitoba-Israel Shared Values Roundtable sponsored a celebratory concert last month, in honour of Israel's 60th anniversary. More than 900 people attended. The group is the brainchild of Manitoba's Minister of Water Stewardship Christine Melnick and the late Harold Buchwald. Melnick has been to Israel several times. "Our group recognizes that the people of Manitoba and Israel share many important values, such as belief in a democratic system of government, respect for freedom of speech and human rights, and commitments to public health care, public child care and education," Melnick said.

It is heartening to note that many Canadian public figures openly acknowledge and laud the deeply held, democratic and life-affirming values that Canada shares with Israel. As long as they do, it is equally heartening to note, Israel will not ever be alone.

25 years ago in The CJN

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak assured U.S. President Ronald Reagan that the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty is "a pillar" of Egyptian policy. Meanwhile, the first brit milah in more than 30 years took place in Alexandrea, Egypt. A rabbi and a mohel came from Israel to officiate. Alexandria had 150 Jews, out of 350 still in Egypt at the time.

Unbalanced political coverage

As a supporter of the Conservative party in the upcoming election, I was disturbed to see the imbalance in space given to the Liberal and Conservative candidates, respectively Susan Kadis and Peter Kent, in the article "Economy, health care concerns in Thornhill riding" (CJN, Sept 25). I would have thought that, given the sensitivity and interest of your subscribers and readers to partisan issues that separate the political parties in the upcoming election, or any election for that matter, that a fair balance of space and treatment would have been given to all parties. To the contrary, significantly more space was devoted to discussing Kadis' positions than Kent's.

This issue is all the more important in light of the obvious favouritism that is shown toward the federal Liberal party by some of the so-called "Jewish establishment" institutions operating in Canada. I would expect these organizations to be impartial and non-partisan vis-à-vis the various political parties and to not support any one party.

Arts funding

I am a writer. It is my job, just like some people are teachers, auto workers, cashiers or doctors. I feel blessed to be able to do what I love, but I never considered myself special until recently, when I read that Prime Minister Stephen Harper said that ordinary people don't care about arts cuts. I guess that makes me out of the ordinary.

I was also pleasantly surprised to learn that the prime minister thinks that I am rich. Remind me to mention that to Revenue Canada when I do my taxes in April. They may be quite surprised, given my income last year.

If ordinary people, by the prime minister's standards, are those who go to work, pay taxes and care about how our government spends those taxes, then please count me in. But let me add this: I am one ordinary person who has had the privilege to live and work outside of this country. I have seen first-hand how widely our artists and writers are received elsewhere in this world and what a wonderful job they do as ambassadors from our country. I am an ordinary person who had her first novel published a year and a half ago and am now thrilled that it is being read and enjoyed by many other ordinary people. I am an ordinary person trying to make a living doing something I love.

When I hit the ballot box, I'll be sure to give my vote to a party that not only thinks I'm special, but treats me that way.

B'nai Brith disciplinary committee

The trite adage, "What goes around, comes around," may have found validity in "B'nai Brith faces human rights complaint" (CJN, Sept. 11).

B'nai Brith Canada's disciplinary committee cited a number of its members for "conduct unbecoming a member… and contrary to the best interests of the organization." The members were informed they would be able to make a submission in person at a hearing.

How did that hearing compare with B'nai Brith Canada's complaints about the Manitoba Human Rights Commission?

Counsel for the members accused by B'nai Brith Canada requested the following:

(a) information as to who authored the complaints – denied (b) identification of the executive committee that authored the accusatory resolution – denied

(c) production of documents given to the discipline committee, but not to defence counsel – produced near the end of proceedings

(d) adjournment to provide defence counsel an opportunity to examine those documents – denied

(e) submissions from members represented by counsel – never happened

Which brings us to that other trite adage, "The pot calling the kettle black."

Seniors' discount for community events

Every year, our Jewish organizations present world-renowned speakers as part of their fundraising events. Those of us who live on pensions would love to hear these speakers. May I suggest the following: ask your speaker if he/she would donate their time to talk to us oldies or the poorer folk in the community. I think a nominal fee of between $5 and $10 would be acceptable to most of us, and I think you would still fill a hall, as well as it being a mitzvah to give us oldies and some younger people the chance to hear some of these wonderful speakers.

Has the Mossad delayed Iran's attainment of the bomb?

By ALUF BENN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

Every Thursday, Mossad chief Meir Dagan and a few of his staff members report to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's office in the old Defence Ministry building in Tel Aviv to present an operation for approval or report on one that has taken place. Olmert loves these moments more than any others in his job. He wants to know the details, to see the faces of the soldiers before the operation. He usually approves Dagan's proposals.

Over the past two years, Dagan has become the most important security official close to the prime minister. His evaluations on the Second Lebanon War and the Mossad's cumulative achievements vis-a-vis Iran, Syria and Hezbollah have strengthened his status and led Olmert to approve more and more daring missions.

During the recent cabinet meeting in which Olmert announced his resignation, the outgoing prime minister said: "I believe the processes the government of Israel has enacted under my leadership in various areas – those that can be told and those that cannot – will yet receive their proper place in the history of the State of Israel."

Olmert didn't go into detail, but over the past year, in September 2007 the nuclear facility that Syria was building was bombed; Hezbollah attributed to Israel last February's assassination of a senior leader, Imad Mughniyah, in Damascus; the foreign press reported the blowing up of a chemical weapons factory in Syria, in which dozens of Iranian and Syrian technicians were killed; and an Iranian Revolutionary Guard convoy delivering weapons to Hezbollah was blown up near Tehran. No one claimed responsibility for these actions.

In June, Olmert announced to the cabinet that Dagan's tenure would be extended by another, seventh year, telling the ministers "there is no doubt that the work of the Mossad has taken off" thanks to Dagan.

The Mossad's main thrust under Dagan has been to thwart Iran's nuclear plans. According to several sources, Israel has managed by diplomatic pressure to obtain a delay of as much as a decade in Iran's attaining nuclear capability, even if it has not been stopped.

"We are being accused in the media of exaggerating warnings and ultimatums," a source in the intelligence community said. "For years we have been saying that Iran is moving toward a nuclear bomb, and it hasn't happened. The reason the evaluation has not come true is because of the pressure brought to bear on Iran."

In the last year of former prime minister Ariel Sharon's term, the defence establishment presented a list of necessary equipment and organizational capabilities to confront the Iranian threat. This included sophisticated deterrents and protection of sensitive facilities, with huge price tags. "Forget it," Dagan reportedly said. "Let me deal with Iran my way. I promise to give you deterrents in time."

Over the past year, a number of reports of malfunctions have emerged regarding the Iranian nuclear project. Among them: an Iranian general who defected, Ali-Reza Asgari, had been involved in leading his country's contacts with Hezbollah; an Iranian dealer in sophisticated communications equipment was charged with spying for Israel and sentenced to death; and his sons, engineers who helped build the Iranian centrifuges, were fielded as double agents for the CIA.

"Thwarting" involves psychological warfare, leaks to the international media and diplomatic moves to embarrass Iran and enlist western countries against it. In one case, the Iranians destroyed a facility near Tehran they were using to develop nuclear weapons and covered it with a soccer field after its existence was leaked to the International Atomic Energy Agency. Dagan is in charge of this work as part of the mandate he received from Sharon, with the co-operation of the Foreign Ministry and the Atomic Energy Commission (and, at certain points, the Strategic Affairs Ministry, headed by former minister Avigdor Lieberman).

Some of those who have voiced the most vociferous warnings against the Iranian threat, including former deputy defense minister Ephraim Sneh and Defense Ministry security department chief Amos Gilad, are full of praise for Dagan. Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, who recommended Dagan's appointment to Sharon, said Dagan restored the Mossad to being "Israel's long operational arm, with the ability to go anywhere and do anything it wanted."

Meir Dagan has brought the famed spy agency 'back to its days of glory'

Sneh has called Dagan a man of "exceptional operational imagination and daring."

President Shimon Peres, who knows the Mossad from the day it was born, said Dagan "brought the Mossad back to its days of glory."

The army has some criticism, especially Military Intelligence, for what appears to be the unjust reaping of credit by the Mossad for successful operations. But even Dagan's adversaries are said to acknowledge his creativity and daring.

The Mossad's budget and human resources have grown by dozens of percentage points during Dagan's tenure. He presents his operations in the Knesset sub-committee on the secret services, which approves his funding, as if he were the CEO of a cellphone company showing the board how many new subscribers he has enlisted.

The Mossad's work is more complex than ever before. When Europe was the arena and the PLO the adversary, things were easier. The Iranian focus has changed the organization's activity, and stricter supervision at airports and border crossings since 9/11 have made it more difficult to create convincing covers for its operatives.

Meir Dagan

Dagan has strengthened ties with parallel services in the United States in the struggle against Iran and the global jihad. That did not come easily. On Dagan's first visit to Washington as head of the Mossad, he explained to his hosts the need for diplomatic isolations and economic sanctions, and above all, secret operations. The American response was cool.

But last month, CIA chief Michael Hayden had warm words for the role played by an unnamed foreign intelligence agency that he said initially identified a structure at Al-Kibar in Syria as a nuclear reactor similar to one in North Korea. He likened the co-operation to "working together on a complex equation over a long period."

Dagan came to the Mossad from the outside six years ago, and he found the organization's veterans suspicious of him. News stories from his early years are full of reports of dismissals of senior people and anger among the old-timers. Dagan's predecessor, Ephraim Halevi, was more of a diplomat who avoided daring operations. Especially after two serious mishaps – the failed assassination of Hamas leader Khaled Meshal in Jordan and an attempt to bug the Iranian Embassy in Cyprus – and in response to the demand to rehabilitate the agency, Halevi began work to thwart the Iranian threat, which Dagan made a major focus.

Sharon knew Dagan from their days together fighting terror in Gaza. Dagan won a medal for jumping on a wanted man and wrestling away a grenade after the man had pulled the pin. The fighters in his unit disguised themselves as Palestinians, booby-trapped grenades belonging to the Popular Front, and gained a reputation in the Israel Defence Forces as merciless assassins.

Citizen Dagan is said to love classical music, jeep trips, smoking a pipe and nature. He has been heard to joke about the fact that he is a vegetarian, despite his particular operational expertise. He served for a few years as head of the counterterrorism unit in the Prime Minister's Office and tried his hand as a security consultant.

He stayed in contact with Sharon, and served as his campaign headquarters chief on election day in 2001. After Sharon's election, Dagan was enlisted to head a special body to fight the funding of terrorism, and a year-and-a-half later, he was appointed head of the Mossad. Then-MK Yossi Sarid opposed what he said was an appointment that smacked of the political advancement of a personal associate, but senior Labor party officials Sneh and Ben-Eliezer were in favour of their old friend's appointment.

Sharon was said to appreciate Dagan's operational capabilities, but less so his diplomatic acumen.

Olmert's entry into power was Dagan's big chance. Olmert did not have the military background of his predecessor, and Dagan's expertise could come to the fore. Olmert used to say that nothing preoccupied him more than the Iranian threat.

Dagan's biggest step forward came as a result of his Lebanon experience. The Winograd Committee that investigated the 2006 war cited his evaluations, which were far more accurate than the IDF's. Four months before the war, in a cabinet discussion about Hezbollah's attempts to kidnap soldiers, Dagan and Gilad warned that any conflict that developed would not end without a ground operation. The day Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev were abducted, on July 12, 2006, Dagan began to insist that a military response would engender a long conflict, in which the home front would suffer, and an air operation would not be enough to decide the outcome.

Dagan is now at the peak of his power. Premier-designate Tzipi Livni, a former junior officer in the Mossad, receives continual updates from him as foreign minister. But she has no experience of approving special operations. It will be interesting to see if she continues to approve Dagan's daring operations, or if she'll step back and sleep on things before making her decisions.

Mandela's mixed legacy

Amid much international fanfare, Nelson Mandela celebrated his 90th birthday earlier this year. Often likened to peace icons as revered as Gandhi and Mother Theresa, Mandela has emerged as the quintessential hero of the 20th century. Former British prime minister, Tony Blair, has described him as the "greatest and most courageous leader of our time."

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

However, the imprint that Mandela will leave behind is not all roses. Yes, there is little doubt that without him, there may well have been a hideously violent insurrection as South Africa threw off the shackles of apartheid in the early 1990s. Even in retrospect, it's evident that he was the right person at the right time to broker a peaceful transition from the excesses of the previous regime to what was hoped would be the moderation of an emerging "rainbow nation" that would serve as a beacon of racial harmony, civil society and good government on an otherwise retrogressive and mostly impoverished subcontinent.

Sadly, the South Africa of the past 14 years has not lived up to expectations. With one of the highest murder rates on the planet, widespread violence that affects every stratum of its society, and a total neglect of any policy to combat an HIV AIDS pandemic that has decimated large segments of its population, the "new" South Africa has turned out to be much more like the rest of "Third World Africa" rather than its mentor and anticipated saviour.

While most of the blame for this rests with Mandela's successor, Thabo Mbeki, the seeds were sown on Mandela's watch. It was Mandela, as well, who turned a blind eye to the tyranny and incompetence of Robert Mugabe, thus enabling the Zimbabwean president to singlehandedly destroy his country's economy and civic infrastructure.

And while many Jewish South Africans still get dewy-eyed at the very mention of Mandela's name, there is relatively little in his relationship with Jews or Israel that is particularly impressive.

He is on record for having supported Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein and for having embraced both Yasser Arafat and Libyan strongman Moammar Gadhafi, affectionately referring to Arafat as his "comrade in arms" and Gadhafi as "my brother leader."

But what is much more troubling than such questionable personal associations is Mandela's myopic and counterproductive attitude to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. By commenting some years ago, for example, that "injustice and gross human rights violations were being perpetrated in Palestine" and by more recently adding his voice to those who accuse Israel of being an "apartheid state," he has declared his biases and added perceived legitimacy to the all-too-common libels that underpin today's rampant anti-Zionism.

So, for various reasons – but, from our perspective, especially when judging his attitude to Israel – Mandela's legacy will be irrevocably tainted.

Next year in Jerusalem no longer assured

We Jews regularly repeat the age-old prayer of "Next Year in Jerusalem." For many of us who call this city home, that entreaty is no longer self-evident. With the New Year upon us and municipal elections just weeks away, it's fitting to examine different prospects for Jerusalem's future.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Jerusalem is a city of contrasts. It has deep-rooted cultural institutions, spiritual wealth, and unequalled physical beauty, as well as being the country's political hub. However, many people also consider it a complex city to live in, with continuing tensions between Arabs and Jews and their incumbent security implications, on the one hand, and between haredim and other Israelis, on the other.

Far more Israelis are leaving the city than choosing it as their home. From 2000 to 2007 alone, 51,100 more people left the city than entered it. They were mainly Jews, both secular and religious (including many haredim).

There are several reasons for this exodus.

Jerusalem is a very poor city. In 2006, more than 40 per cent of its entire populace and 27 per cent of its Jews were statistically poor.

To add insult to injury, house prices in the city have skyrocketed – more than 20 per cent in 2006-7 alone – and continued to rise during this year's early months. This increase was largely due to thousands of real estate purchases made by foreign residents, many of whom want a foothold in Jerusalem, but whose properties remain empty for most of the year.

As a result, many young people can no longer afford to live in the city. Haredim are moving to large ultra-Orthodox towns, such as Betar Illit, Emanuel and Kiryat Sefer in the West Bank, and to other places within the Green Line. Secular and modern Orthodox people are leaving for satellite communities around Jerusalem, such as Mevasseret Zion and Ma'ale Adumim. Almost one-third of all who've left since 2000 moved westward to the metropolitan Tel Aviv area.

Furthermore, some non-haredi Jewish Jerusalemites, mostly young, feel there's no future for them and their like in the city. They feel stifled by its complexities and view it as a bland, parochial backwater, inhabited by government and university employees. They're looking elsewhere for less weighty alternatives.

Much of the problem is image-related. While it doesn't have a beach or some of Tel Aviv's flair and cosmopolitan sophistication, Jerusalem, with all its contradictions, is a wonderful place to live and bring up a family. It has a great cultural life, excellent museums and galleries, terrific restaurants, clubs and bars (many open on Saturdays), an array of schools providing a good education for the city's varied populations and demands, and employment opportunities, not limited to government and academia, in commerce and industry. All this with the obvious bonus of living in one of the world's most beautiful and historical cities – juxtaposed as a crossroads for all three major western religions.

This brings us to the upcoming municipal elections. The previous vote, held in 2003, resulted in Jerusalem's first haredi mayor, Uri Lupianski, and a city council with an Orthodox plurality. Lupianski received 51.4 per cent of the votes in the mayoral race, while the leading secular candidate, successful businessman Nir Barkat, received 42.5 per cent of the votes. Eighteen of 31 council seats went to Orthodox candidates.

Considering that roughly a third of Jerusalem's population of 750,000 are Arabs who traditionally boycott these elections for ideological reasons, and that the haredim comprise only 30 per cent of the remaining populace, these results were not a foregone conclusion. They were a product of secular apathy. While 70 per cent of haredim exercised their right to vote, only 50 per cent of others did so.

Non-haredim had no one to blame but themselves, but the results only added to the mood that the city is moving toward religious control. Since then, the rate of movement out of the city has grown. The number of pupils in secular primary and secondary schools is falling, while the number of haredi pupils and schools is on a continual rise.

This time round, there finally seems to be a genuine air of urgency among the non-haredi voter base. Barkat, who's running again for mayor, is ahead in all the polls and the haredim are still bickering about who'll be their candidate. There's an understanding among many Jerusalemites that another haredi victory will have serious long-term ramifications for the nature of our capital and that they can no longer stand idly by.

Jerusalem terror: predictable 'spontaneity'

For more than 60 years, campaigns of incitement and hatred have taught Palestinians to use violence against Israel, and as a response to each wave is developed, a new tactic is found. The excuses change according to the climate, moving from Palestinian refugee claims, economic rationalizations, "occupation and settlement" (after the 1967 war), false claims of "war crimes," etc., but the underlying strategy of "armed struggle" and "resistance" remains steady.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The most recent wave has taken the form of hit-and-run attacks in Jerusalem's streets, as Palestinian terrorists find it more difficult to carry explosives across the separation barrier. Two deadly assaults involved bulldozers used for construction, and on Sept. 21, the third such attack took place – in this case, the "militant" (in Reuters-speak) plowed a passenger car into a group of pedestrians at high speed. These attacks, as well as a murderous rampage in the Rav Kook yeshiva, were carried out by east Jerusalem Arabs who live inside the barrier and do not have to cross the Israel Defence Forces checkpoints.

Although the attacks are described as spontaneous individual outbursts, and no organization has been found to be involved, they are part of the constant pattern of hatred and terror aimed at Israelis and Jews. The armistice that ended the 1948 Independence War was followed by the beginning of infiltrations by Fedayeen based in Jordan and Egypt, who attacked Israeli civilians nearby. When these were halted, the attacks led by Yasser Arafat's PLO shifted to the Jordanian-occupied West Bank, (until 1967), to Jordan itself (until 1970), and from there to Lebanon. More recently, when IDF operations such as Defensive Shield and the construction of a security barrier ended the suicide bombing campaign (misnamed "the second intifadah"), rocket barrages started from Gaza. And after Israeli strikes led the Hamas leadership in Gaza to impose a temporary ceasefire, the hit-and-run assaults began in Jerusalem.

As the latest attacks demonstrate, Palestinians are capable of reading the signals and acting on their own, with whatever weapons are most readily available. This may be a rifle, a suicide belt filled with explosives, rockets assembled in Gaza, a bulldozer, or a BMW. The steady incitement plays a central role, including Palestinian television programming preaching the virtues of martyrdom and the glory of fighting the Zionist enemy. As a result, the isolated action may appear to be spontaneous, but the foundation and preparations are never far away.

Palestinians also recognize that the United Nations and the powerful non-government organizations claiming to promote human rights rarely respond to terror, in contrast to their shrill condemnations of Israeli responses. In the Second Lebanon War, and in recent months, during the Gaza rocket attacks, the statements and campaigns by Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch, B'tselem, Alternatives (based in Montreal and funded in part by the Canadian government) and others focused primarily on falsely accusing Israel of "war crimes."

If Israel were to take steps to deter or defend against these attacks, such as destroying the houses of the terrorists, or preventing Palestinian residents of east Jerusalem from entering the city with their cars, the accusations of "racism" and "collective punishment" would follow immediately. For Palestinians and their supporters, all Israeli responses to terror are illegitimate.

To defeat this strategy, and end terror in its different forms, this incitement must end. The moderate Palestinian leaders who are credited with negotiating peace must move clearly and decisively to stop the parallel demonization and delegitimization of Israel in the United Nations, particularly in the context of the Human Rights Council. If Palestinian officials continue to use the discredited Durban process to use terms such as "apartheid," all aid to the Palestinian Authority and its NGOs should be cut off.

The Canadian government, which has recently granted another large aid budget to the Palestinians, can set an important example. Unless the incitement ends, terror will continue, this money will be wasted, and there will never be Palestinian economic development, peace or regional stability.

The Kirshner File

An oasis in a harsh desert environment

Sde Nitzan is a speck in the remote wastes of the western Negev Desert, an oasis south of the volatile Gaza Strip and east of the tranquil Egyptian border.

The bleak area south of Sde Nitzan is an empty, sun-baked quarter of sand dunes and gravel plains, one of Israel's last frontiers.

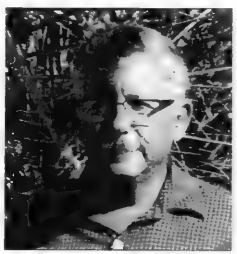
Sheldon Kirshner in Israel

Thirty four years ago, when Efraim Perlmutter arrived at this moshav as a 31-year-old American who had made aliyah the year before, this arid region was far less settled than it is today.

"If I had known what lay ahead," he said the other afternoon, "I might not have come here. But it's been a challenging life."

Sde Nitzan and the archipelago of rural communities around it were built with the express purpose of developing the Negev, which comprises two-thirds of Israel's land mass. The Jewish National Fund played an integral role in preparing the land and infrastructure.

David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first and perhaps greatest prime minister, decreed that the Negev's development was a national priority. He poured scarce resources into it, and when he retired, he settled in Sde Boker, a kibbutz facing an immense desert crater. Some of his successors, intent on retaining territories won in the Six Day War, placed considerably less emphasis on making the Negev green. But in general, Israel has kept faith with Ben-Gurion's dream.



Efraim Perlmutter

Sde Nitzan, about an hour's drive from Be'er Sheva, the capital of the Negev, is a pivotal component of Israel's long-range plan to conquer the desert. Established in 1973 as an agricultural settlement for new immigrants from Anglophone countries, Sde Nitzan broke the spirit of many of the newcomers, who simply dropped out in exhaustion. The climate was harsh, the demands unyielding and unfamiliar and hard. Israelis replaced the dropouts, but eventually, North American Jews like Perlmutter joined them. Perlmutter, originally from Washington, D.C., is a life-long Zionist, having been a member of the Habonim youth movement and having resolved to settle in Israel when he was only 16 years old.

True to his convictions, he spent a year on Kibbutz Gesher Haziv when he was 17. Returning to the United States, he continued his studies. While pursuing a graduate degree in political science at the University of Maryland, he read a story in the Jerusalem Post that piqued his attention. It was about a Jewish agronomist from New Zealand, a nephew of the renowned Yiddish writer Isaac Lieb Peretz, who had immigrated to Israel and had introduced the glasshouse concept of agricultural to Israel. Upon further delving into the matter, Perlmutter discovered that this revolutionary method shortens the growing season, increases yield and uses less water, a perfect formula for Israel.

Captivated by the concept and by the notion that he could transform himself into a farmer, Perlmutter finally immigrated to Israel. He reached Sde Nitzan in 1974, just months after the Yom Kippur War.

Perlmutter's life-changing decision to reinvent himself was surprising, to say the least.

Apart from having worked as a volunteer in a chicken and turkey coop at a kibbutz when he was a teenager, Perlmutter knew virtually nothing about farming. And as a city slicker to the marrow of his bones, he always assumed that he would live in an urban environment."I never thought I would end up on a moshav, much less the Negev," he said, sitting in the kitchen of his rather modest cottage and sipping a cold Coke to ward off the heat.

Having committed himself to the moshav, he was presented with the choice of either tending to tomatoes or flowers, the two crops Sde Nitzan concentrated on at the time.

He chose tomatoes. "It turned out well," he said. "I survived."

But the hours were incredibly long and he was forced to supplement his income by teaching at a local school.

Samuel Cohen at the Besor reservoir

Perlmutter, assisted by his wife, was a tomato farmer 20 years, until he got fed up with Israel's byzantine export regulations and resolved to expand his horizons.

These days, he tends to pineapples and ruscus, a green ornamental plant native to Europe, Africa and southwest Asia and normally used at festive occasions. Neither is as labour intensive as tomatoes, he noted. He ships the bulk of the pineapples to Tel Aviv and the ruscus to markets in Europe, Japan and the United States.

"I'm not rich, but by Israeli standards, I'm well off," he explained. "I put food on the table."

Sde Nitzan has a population of 400 – the majority of whom are native-born Israelis – and 74 self-contained farming units. Typically, each house is attached to a field. Perlmutter owns 8-1/2 dunams (one dunam is equal to 900 square metres), plus more land in partnership with associates.

Crops are grown in hothouses and fed and watered electronically through a drip system of irrigation.

Like most farmers in Israel nowadays, he relies on Thai workers to care for and harvest crops. He and his partners employ six Thais, whom he praises as diligent and reliable workers.

Sde Nitzan no longer has Palestinian Arab workers on its payroll. "We never employed Palestinians on a big scale," he said.

Prior to the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising, farmers like Perlmutter performed much of the manual work themselves, only using Palestinian farm hands when absolutely necessary.

Being seven kilometres from Gaza, Sde Nitzan has been occasionally shelled by Qassam rockets and mortars, but all the projectiles fired by Palestinian militants have landed in empty fields, not causing any material damage or injuries.

Perlmutter has four children, three sons and one daughter, but only his daughter has remained on the moshav. His eldest son is employed by a hotel at the Dead Sea, while his youngest one resides in Tel Aviv. The middle son lives in Australia.

Perlmutter has no intention of leaving Sde Nitzan. "Life is more intense here than in the city," he said.

He is grateful that the Jewish National Fund has taken such an interest in the Negev. "Without the JNF, the moshav could not have been built."

Nor could Sde Nitzan have survived without the benefit of the JNF's Besor reservoir, a relatively short distance away.

Constructed about a decade ago with the help of JNF branches in Australia, South Africa and the United States, it was conceived to provide the region with an extra 10 million cubic metres of recycled water annually.

The water, used exclusively for agriculture, comes from a sewage plant in Tel Aviv and from flash flood, said Samuel Cohen, an engineer employed by Mekorot, Israel's national water company.

Cohen said that the Besor complex consists of three pools, the Lower Rehovot reservoir, the Upper Rehovot reservoir and the Besor reservoir.

The Besor reservoir, the largest ever built by the JNF, is a sight to behold, resembling nothing less than a small lake in a hard-scrabble tan landscape. Stocked with 100,000 male fish to feed on algae, the reservoir is 17 metres deep when full.

Thanks to it, farmers are able to cultivate 25,000 dunams of citrus, corn, wheat, sunflowers and vegetables, much of it for export, in this heretofore inhospitable region.

"This was once desert," said Cohen.

And now, miraculously, it is a lush garden.

Israel paramount concern to forum audience

For her part, Frei said that while her party supports Israel, it also wants to bring its environmental challenges to light.

"What's the point of defending our homeland if at the same time we're making it unlivable?" she asked, referring to sentiment expressed by Israel's Green party on its website.

Wallace opened by saying the NDP has had a "long and honourable" tradition of working with Canada's ethnic communities and would continue to do so if elected.

Throughout the evening, the candidates tackled questions ranging from their parties' platforms on dealing with a nuclear Iran led by President Mahmoud Amahdinejad to how Canada can prevent tax dollars from reaching terror groups to what their favourite commandment is.

Kenney could barely spit out Amahdinejad's name and title, and he reassured the audience that the Conservatives have been "clear in consistently denouncing" his regime. He later added that the best way to counter Iran's "insane" leadership is to help foster civic society in that country so that "one day, the Persian people will elect a new, sane, government."

Volpe summed up the subject by saying he didn't "think there's a person in this room who wouldn't condemn Ahmadinejad." He then chided the Tories for not "implementing Canada's role under the genocide convention" by refusing to support a motion proposed by Liberal MP Irwin Cotler that urges bringing Ahmadinejad to justice by charging him and Iran with incitement to genocide under international law.

In his rebuttal, Kenney said that when Cotler's motion came before Parliament, the "Israeli government was not in favour" of it because it was concerned it would be used as a "propaganda tool" by Amahdinejad if the motion was defeated at the United Nations.

Frei called Iran's build-up of nuclear capacity "very worrisome," but said there has been a lot of "spin" on the issue and that it's still not clear what stage Iran's nuclear development is at. She cited last year's U.S. National Intelligence Estimate report, which suggested Iran won't achieve nuclear capacity until at least 2013 and warned that any "weapons-based solution" is not part of the Green party's ethos.

Wallace said that the NDP has called for "condemnation of Iran" for its threats to destroy Israel and that her party agrees there must be "absolute vigilance on the proliferation of nuclear weapons."

Referring to Durban II, she added that the NDP has also stated that it would not allow Canada to be part of any peace conference that could be "hijacked in the name of anti-Semitism."

The candidates also spoke about their various parties' positions on the arts, taxation and the economy, echoing what their party leaders have been saying. But the topic of Israel was of paramount concern to the audience.

With regard to the question of Israel's security and Canada's role in ensuring it, Kenney noted that "Israel was roundly condemned in 1981 for taking out the Iraqi nuclear reactor. Today, I think most people are glad they did."

Volpe said a Liberal government would support its "critical ally in the Middle East" by providing logistical support to help it fend off any attack.

Wallace reiterated that the NDP "is a party of peace and dialogue, and our armed forces exist… to protect our national interests," although she said her party has "heightened empathy" for Israel.

In closing, Kenney recapped Prime Minister Stephen Harper's actions in standing up for Israel on the world stage. Volpe ended the evening by reminding the crowd that he has been "unwavering and consistent" in his support for Israel and issues important to the Jewish community. Frei summed up by saying that while the Conservatives have a "great record" on Israel, it shouldn't be the only consideration when going to the polls.

Israeli social, economic issues are 'a time bomb'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Now that Israel is 60 years old, it's "definitely time" for some soul-searching and tough questions regarding social issues, Rachel Liel says.

The director of SHATIL, the New Israel Fund's empowerment and training centre, was in Toronto to speak at Congregation Darchei Noam on Sept. 22 about "Meeting Israel's Greatest Internal Challenges." Her talk was co-sponsored by the synagogue and the New Israel Fund of Canada.

Among the issues that Liel cited were treatment of Arabs, the role of Ethiopian kessim (Jewish spiritual leaders) and the gap between rich and poor. Social and economic justice issues constitute "a time bomb" in Israel, Liel said.

"Very poor people live right across the street. It's not like America, where you have to drive to see them."

She noted that people tend to "go to the heavy [political] issues before we go to these issues." But she said there is much that can be done to address socio-economic issues, and she believes that, while "nobody denies that we are in a state of threat," the issues are interconnected.

Israelis have a per capita income of about $30,000 a year, which is better than that of Belgians, Liel said. In the last three years alone, she added, there were 7,000 new Israeli millionaires.

However, she said, 20 per cent of Israelis live below the poverty line, among them every third child. As well, she said that half of the low-income Israelis are the "working poor," a new category.

"The data about gaps and poverty in Israel is not something we can accept... We are number 1 in the western world in social and economic gaps. We need to fix it."

An Israeli-born child of Holocaust survivors who grew up in Herzliah, Liel said her three children don't even remember the "Zionist dream."

Her daughter, she said, is interested in "the green agenda," an issue that she said is closely tied to social justice. "How come they build refineries in poor neighbourhoods?" Liel asked. "How come rich people get clean air and poor people don't?"

Liel, who began her career working for the Israeli government, became interested in working at the grassroots level when her husband served as Israeli ambassador to South Africa from 1992 to 1995 and they witnessed the fall of apartheid.

"This was a transformative period in my life," she said.

"Being in South Africa in those times was really seeing people who were oppressed, who didn't have a voice, suddenly voting for the first time and getting organized. It all happened in front of my eyes. When you see old African women standing three days in the sun waiting to vote – women who couldn't read or write – there is something so inspiring about it."

SHATIL – a Hebrew word that means "seedling" and is also an acronym for the organization's Hebrew name – proved to be the opportunity Liel was looking for on her return to Israel.

The organization's efforts to improve society include "helping groups get organized and advocating for their rights." SHATIL facilitates partnerships and teaches groups how to lobby government effectively.

Liel said it's a privilege to work with disempowered groups, including immigrants and Arab Israelis who make up 20 per cent of the population. Her organization's aim is to help them to help themselves. "This is how dignity is maintained and strengthened."

Despite all the challenges, she said, "there isn't a place like Israel in the entire world. It's dynamic and vibrant. There are young people with fantastic ideas. There's never a dull moment – for better and worse."

Lack of context makes Globe reports inaccurate

Two recent reports in the Globe and Mail illustrate a lack of context which, when dealing with the complexities of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, make for inaccurate and one-sided journalism.

In "Palestinians' underground lifelines" (Globe and Mail, Sept. 26) Carolynne Wheeler reported about the smuggling tunnels that run from Egypt into the Gaza town of Rafah.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Key elements of this piece are either inaccurate or woefully incomplete.

Wheeler wrote: "[T]hree years after Israel pulled its soldiers and settlers out of Gaza, the tunnels are thriving as the only means of import and export since the sealing of Gaza's borders in June, 2007, when the Islamist group Hamas violently wrenched control."

Unstated is the fact since Israel and Hamas reached a ceasefire this past summer, an average of 100 truckloads of food, fuel and medical supplies per day are being shipped from Israel into Gaza. The flow of goods is interrupted only when Israel temporarily closes the crossings in response to rocket and mortar firings into Israeli territory.

Yet according to Wheeler, were it not for the smuggling through the tunnels, several hundred of which reportedly exist, the Palestinians in Gaza would be in a perilous state of deprivation.

Also ignored is the fact that even prior to the ceasefire, Israel shipped essential humanitarian goods into Gaza under United Nations supervision. Israel was frequently forced to abandon its efforts due to mortar fire on the crossings. Western journalists rarely reported about these events, even when a UN spokesperson criticized the Palestinians for impairing the flow of essential goods.

More egregious still is Wheeler's claim that "In the past, Hamas kept a tight lid on the smugglers, sealing tunnels and fining their owners. But with no end to Israel's economic blockade in sight, and with the Egyptians bowing to international pressure to keep their border crossing with Gaza sealed, even Hamas, which brags of clamping down on other criminal activity, has had to shrug and look the other way."

It's simply not true that Hamas took on the smugglers, at least not in the way that Wheeler implies, with Hamas acting as a "good cop." Hamas has always relied on, and benefited from, the smuggling, especially in weapons.

Hamas was provoked because the tunnels were in the hands of Gaza clans, many of whom are allied with rival faction Fatah. Hamas set about taking control of the tunnels by insisting on getting a cut of everything "imported" by the clans.

As to Egypt's bowing to "international pressure" to keep its border with Gaza closed, the reality again is substantially different. While there has indeed been such pressure, Egypt, first and foremost, is acting in its own interest. It is trying to prevent Hamas, an outgrowth of the Muslim Brotherhood that threatens President Hosni Mubarak's regime, from being able to operate freely in Egypt and thereby add to its instability.

Mark MacKinnon's piece, "Going through hell to reach heaven" (Globe and Mail, Sept. 27) was a sympathetic account of the ordeal that Nader Deek, a 26-year-old West Bank resident, went through in order to pray at Jerusalem's Al-Aqsa Mosque during Ramadan.

Violating Israeli law and dodging an Israeli checkpoint, Deek eventually made his way through fetid water in a drainage pipe to achieve his goal.

MacKinnon noted: "[S]ince the second intifadah... Palestinian men [from the West Bank] under the age of 45 and women under 35 are barred" from the mosque.

Yet, the only reason MacKinnon gave for Israel's restriction is "the idea that young people are more likely to cause trouble" such as "riots after Friday prayers."

Unmentioned is the much more relevant fact that Palestinian men under 45 have been involved in terrorist attacks on Israeli civilians. By omitting any reference to terrorism, MacKinnon deprived the reader of the broader context that led to the Israeli restrictions, making them seem more punitive.

MacKinnon also wrote: "It has never been easy for West Bank Palestinians to go to the al-Aqsa Mosque." This is not correct. Before the first intifadah, access to the mosque was taken for granted, except when there were isolated acts of violence.

More younger kids bodes well for Winnipeg's Gray Academy

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — While the 572 students enrolled at the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education (BJE) Gray Academy of Jewish Education is virtually the same number as last year, head of school Rory Paul is particularly happy about the number of children in the school's early years program.

"We have had to add a third junior kindergarten class and a third Grade 1 class for this year," he said. "That bodes well for the future, especially since demographic figures indicate that there has been a slight decline in the number of school-age children in Winnipeg."

He also hopes the increase will boost the school's enrolment 10 years from now, since Gray Academy traditionally loses a substantial number of students at the junior and senior high school level to other private schools – and at the senior high level in particular, to the University of Winnipeg Collegiate program.

Gray Academy – Winnipeg's main Jewish private school, with students from kindergarten to Grade 12 – is also benefiting from a bequest by the late Samuel Grosberg. The Holocaust survivor, who died childless three years ago, left $500,000 to Jewish education in the city.

That amount and other funds donated by Grosberg are being administered by the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba. Interest earned on the capital is being used to pay the tuition of several Gray Academy students from less well-to-do families who wouldn't otherwise be able to afford it.

This year marks the third year of the school's international student program. Once again this year, the school is hosting one student from Brazil and another from Chile who are here for the opportunity to receive a Jewish education and to earn a Canadian high school diploma, which would make them eligible to attend any Canadian university. (Gray Academy graduates receive two diplomas – a standard provincial diploma and a diploma in Jewish studies.)

"Our school is a member of the Manitoba Council for International Education, and we have been certified and accredited by RAVSAK: The Jewish Community Day School Network," Paul said. "Gray Academy has become one of the top Jewish schools in North America."

New this year Winnipeg Jewish families also have the option of enrolling their younger children in North America's only public Hebrew bilingual programs, which are 100 per cent government-funded.

Enrolment in the Hebrew bilingual program at Brock Corydon Elementary School in south Winnipeg has remained steady at about 180 students – peak capacity – for the last several years.

In north Winnipeg, with its declining young Jewish population, Margaret Park Elementary School continues to register a corresponding decease in student numbers. Margaret Park's Hebrew bilingual program has just 50 students this fall, down from 60 last year. For observant families, there is one more educational option. The 10-year-old Ohr HaTorah Day School, an Orthodox elementary and junior high school that holds classes at the Herzlia-Adas Yeshurun Synagogue in south Winnipeg, has an enrolment of 50 this year, about the same as last year.

The school has a new principal this fall, Rabbi Uriel Malka, 30, a veteran of the Second Lebanon War two years ago. He and his wife, Ortal, are from Karnei Shomron and both have bachelor of education degrees from the Beit Midrash for Teachers of Judaic Studies in Rehovot, Israel. Rabbi Malka is also a graduate of Israel's Hesder Yeshiva program, which combines Talmud study and military service within a religious Zionist framework.

The Malkas and their five children arrived in Winnipeg at the beginning of August. Both the rabbi and his wife are teaching at the school.

Young rabbi takes reins at troubled Winnipeg shul

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Twenty-nine-year-old Rabbi Ari Ellis is the new spiritual leader at Herzlia Adas-Yeshurun Synagogue, an Orthodox synagogue in Winnipeg's south end.

It's Rabbi Ellis' first position as a pulpit rabbi and he said he's looking forward to getting to know the community.

Rabbi Ari Ellis

For the last year, the 100-family congregation has been without a spiritual leader since the departure of Rabbi Tzvi Muller.

In June 2007, the badly divided synagogue had a contested election for its board of directors, an event that had not occurred for many years. The synagogue currently doesn't have a president, and there was no quorum at its annual general meeting in June. The most recent executive director, Rona Davies, is also no longer working at the synagogue.

Rabbi Ellis said he sees himself as bringing a fresh start to the shul and enabling it "to move forward."

He also hopes to be a resource for all of the Jewish community.

"I see myself here as not just specifically to serve the Orthodox community, but to serve all of the community. I have spent time… meeting with leaders from the Jewish federation… the Gray Academy [of Jewish Education], and other organizations. I anticipate spending more time at the Gray Academy and hope to get to know the community. I am meeting people and getting different perspectives," he said.

He said he is also looking forward to working with Rabbi Uriel Malka, the new principal of Ohr Hatorah Day School, the modern Orthodox day school located in the synagogue building.

"I know him [Rabbi Malka] from Israel. We studied in the same program… He and I are both interested in Jewish education and awareness and understand that children are the future of our community."

Born and raised in Los Angeles, Rabbi Ellis, who has lived in Israel for the last six years, admitted, "I'm not quite sure what to expect from Winnipeg winters."

Ellis didn't grow up in an Orthodox household, and he attended the Conservative University of Judaism (now the American Jewish University) in Los Angeles and began attending an Orthodox shul. He received his master's in education and administration from the University of Judaism's Fingerhut School of Education.

Rabbi Ellis studied at Yeshivat Hamivtar under Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, chief rabbi of Efrat, and received his smichah in May 2007.

Ellis said he and his wife Tikva, 25, wanted to come to a smaller Jewish community.

"Of course, it's great for any Jew to live in Israel, but we figured that if we weren't going to be in Israel, we didn't need to be in a larger Jewish centre. There are enough rabbis in New York or Los Angeles… We figured it would be good to be in a smaller community where we felt we could make a difference."

Rabbi Ellis said one of his areas of interest is "in the application of Halachah to issues of technology… and medical ethics."

The couple, who arrived in Winnipeg at the end of August, have two children, ages two and six months. Tikva Ellis, who is from Sacramento, is working in the preschool at Ohr Hatorah Day School.

Supreme Court won't hear chassidim's appeal

MONTREAL — The Supreme Court of Canada will not hear a chassidic group's appeal to keep its summertime Laurentian synagogue and school open

The high court dismissed with costs the case of the Congregation of the Followers of the Rabbis of Belz to Strengthen the Torah vs. the municipality of Val Morin.

The Belzers were contesting a Quebec Court of Appeal decision last April in the town's favour over a zoning dispute that goes back more than 25 years.

The Court of Appeal ruled that the group is violating municipal bylaws by using two houses, one for worship and the other for their children's religious education, at the community's summer enclave in Val Morin. The area is zoned for residential use only, and the court decided that the houses are, in fact, institutions.

Quebec Superior Court reached the same conclusion in 2005.

The community was given permission by the Court of Appeal to continue to use the houses in the same manner this summer, after it filed its case with the Supreme Court in June.

The Belzers, who consist of about 50 Montreal families who spend two months a year in Val Morin, were represented by prominent civil rights defender Julius Grey. He argued that his clients' religious freedom is being infringed and that the congregation should be exempt from the bylaw.

The Supreme Court did not offer any reason for its refusal to hear the case.

Jewish marine plays against stereotype

By RITA POLIAKOV
Special to The CJN

Dave Rosner doesn't look like a U.S. marine. With his short stature, wire-rimmed glasses and kippah, he looks more like the army's accountant, or, as he puts it, "the guy that designs their website."

Still, despite his appearance, Rosner was a full-time U.S. marine for more than four years, and he has been a part-time marine on reserve duty for 14 years. He served in both the first Gulf War and in Iraq.

Rosner, who specializes in intelligence and public affairs, is currently a lieutenant colonel and a member of the Marines' public affairs unit in Manhattan. And, in his spare time, he's a stand-up comedian.

On Sept. 25, Rosner proved his worth as a comedian at the Chabad Lubavitch of Markham synagogue.

"I know it's very odd to hear the word Jewish marine and not hear the word biologist after that," he said to the crowd. "But I never liked science."

Rosner's first joke was met with a titter of laughter, but his last was met with a roar. It wasn't just the comedian's humour that won over the audience, but his sincerity.

Amid jokes about his appearance, his "Jew food" and his Marine Corps radio call sign – Mazel Tov Cocktail – there came moments of honesty, like his reaction to the war in Iraq.

"I said, 'If we're going to war, you've got to take me.'"

In 2003, he was given 24 hours to decide whether he would join the fight in Iraq.

"I had sideburns, I was doing standup every night… but I knew I'd go."

Rosner's smile began to fade as he told the audience about the enemy's use of children as decoys. Throughout the show, he quickly made the switch from comedian to marine and back again. The audience responded well, laughing in the right places and nodding quietly during the silences.

But Rosner's stories were about more than Jewish wine and yarmulkes. They were about a proud Jew trying to maintain his culture.

It was the Marine Corps that helped Rosner connect to his religion.

"My father had said, 'Don't let them know you're Jewish.'"

When he first joined the U.S. Marines, his dog tags listed no religion. In Saudi Arabia, he decided to change his tags. From then on, his religion was public knowledge.

As a reserve marine, Rosner can be called to serve for short or long periods of time. His 96 days at the marine base in Hawaii gave him culture shock. Or rather, he caused culture shock. After putting up two mezuzahs in his room, he noticed that it wasn't being cleaned.

"I went to the front desk. They said 'The maids are afraid of the things on your door. They think it's witchcraft.'"

Unlike most standup comedy shows, Rosner ended with a question-and-answer period.

"Are you single?" asked a woman in the back.

"Yes," he replied, looking worried.

"I've got a girl for you," the woman said.

Rosner sighed, smiling. "Only in a Jewish crowd."

The connection between Yom Kippur and Sukkot

By RABBI MORDECAI ZEITZ

The jump from Yom Kippur to Sukkot appears gigantic. Two different solitudes: one a day of judgment with fasting and solemnity; the other a festival whose very name is zman simchatainu – a time of rejoicing. We stand in the shadow of Yom Kippur just concluded and in anticipation of Sukkot this coming week. Two unconnected events or maybe not.

According to Jewish law, immediately after breaking our fast we are to go outside and at least start the building of our sukkah. Our rabbis were not general contractors setting up a time line to meet a deadline. There are still four days to get it done so why push it? But it appears that Yom Kippur and the sukkah are really an extension, one of the other. The essence of the sukkah is what Yom Kippur was all about. One complements the other. If you really want to experience Yom Kippur, then build a sukkah!

The very essence of the Jewish People is the ability to maintain a delicate balance between worry and concern for the future with the ability to find reason enough to celebrate life with joy and determination despite the uncertainty that exists. Yom Kippur and Sukkot are kindred spirits representing the co-existence of these two realities of Jewish life.

On Yom Kippur we had a real personal one-on-one with God. It's the day that God is closest to each of us and the very nature of the day brings us up a notch, truly feeling a connection with the Creator. In the light of this special day, I am able to see my life and the world in a slightly different fashion and resolve to make some adjustments more to His/Her way of thinking. At the same time we let God know that He created the human situation a little less than perfectly and so forgiveness is in the air. Hopefully, there is room for some give-and-take but no guarantees. On the way out after Neilah, God says: "You know – Salachti Kidvarecha; I shall forgive you, as you said!"

Pretty neat, but it's not so simple. 'Salachti Kidvarecha' is not an answer but a condition. Your forgiveness is dependent upon 'devarecha' your frame of mind and your actions to back up your Yom Kippur words. On Yom Kippur your future world was shaky but you were determined to work out a deal. You left with good and optimistic feelings but nothing absolute. So how do we back it up?

I go out and build a house of joy – a sukkah – worthy of brachah even as I ponder my fate which is yet to be disclosed. I make plans for the future and I implement them despite lingering doubts about my future. My resolute action sets up 'Kidvarecha' so as to be worthy of God's 'Salachti'.

A sukkah, like life itself, is frail, fragile and very temporary. But that doesn't stop me from filling it, wall-to-wall, with simchah and celebration. I literally take dead wood or leaves – the sukkah roof called schach – and breathe life into them creating a celebration of life. I start immediately after Yom Kippur and continue on through the Festival of Sukkot and thereafter, everyday, showing through my actions that I am worthy of God's continuing trust. I know how to make the blessing of life something long lasting.

How did I do on Yom Kippur to warrant 'Salachti'? Well, that all depends on the 'Devarim', the positive attitude I display as I face the challenges in a very shaky and uncertain world.

So God checks out our sukkah so as to wrap up His/Her Yom Kippur books. My 'Devarim' on Sukkot and thereafter is a validation of my sincerity about the purpose of my life as shared with God on Yom Kippur. Sukkot gives us a heads-up so as to set the pattern and tone for the weeks and months to come. The sukkah itself might be flimsy and fragile but by adding the human dimension, we have the making of yamim tovim, great days of meaningful joy and celebration.

We can make God's job easier this year by living it up in a sukkah and making it our entry point for a continuing year of joyous and successful life. Gmar Tov and Chag Sameach.

Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz is spiritual leader at Congregation Beth Tikvah Ahavat Shalom Nusach Hoari in Montreal.

Keeping tzedakah close to home

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

The ethic of giving charity has long been ingrained in Jewish law and practice, and Jewish communities have rightly prided themselves on the generosity exhibited by its members in small and large ways. And despite recent turbulence in world financial markets, there appears to be plenty of dollars still potentially available for tzedakah. But a 2003 study by researcher Gary A. Tobin, president of the Institute for Jewish and Community Research in San Francisco, reveals important and somewhat disturbing trends that will have a direct impact on how Judaism conducts its business in years and decades to come.

On the plus side, Tobin writes, Jewish individuals and organizations give away billions of dollars every year, and seem to do so in disproportionately greater amounts than their numbers would suggest. But Tobin found that between 1995 and 2000, only six per cent of gifts given away by Jewish mega-donors went to Jewish causes. From 2000 to 2003, that figure dropped to five per cent. In 2006, despite the fact that four of America's five biggest donors were Jewish, the vast majority of their money was left to non-Jewish causes. Robert Stanton's $100-million gift to Yeshiva University was the sole super mega-gift (defined as $100 million and up) to a Jewish cause in 2006.

Tobin's analysis of these developments is noteworthy: "Not only have Jews prospered economically, they are now able to prosper socially and politically and participate in every aspect of American society. All that is positive. The question becomes: How do Jewish organizations and causes effectively compete in that environment?"

Thus the struggle to integrate into the larger society has by and large been won, but the great ensuing irony is whether Jewish culture will get left behind financially. Naturally, there are still many people supporting many Jewish causes, but as any day school parent will be able to tell you, the cost of tuition is rising almost beyond the breaking point. Parents rightly expect quality for their money; teachers expect to be properly remunerated; but students aspire to well paying jobs, and education is well down on their list. In this vicious cycle lies a problem for the future of Jewish schools. The struggles manifest themselves in all parts of the system: parents squeezed to pay for an education they do not always admire; teachers sometimes drained and burnt out with salaries that might not meet their own home budget; schools trying to cope with all of it and more.

Money is not the answer to everything, but if our community's charitable giving became more targeted in the field of Jewish education, there is little doubt that we would see a brighter future for our children's Jewish identity. Sometimes givers are not even aware of all of the opportunities. A case in point: as the director of York University's Jewish teacher education program, I know that donors who give to scholarships for our Jewish teacher candidates will, above a certain level, have every one of their dollars matched by the Ontario government, which leads to a bittersweet but hopeful scenario. The same province that a year ago did not want to alleviate the tuition bill of Jewish parents will, ironically, help to support the future teachers of our children.

Benjamin Disraeli* by Adam Kirsch, Random House of Canada.

Disraeli's Jewishness gave him confidence

Benjamin Disraeli (1804-1881) was the most exotic figure ever to reach the summit of British politics. He is still remembered as a notable exception in British history. More than a century and a quarter after his death, he is still the only Jew to have been prime minister of England.

When his father had him converted to Protestantism at the age of 12, his desire was to open for him avenues of education that otherwise were closed. He could not have foreseen that the change in religion would make it possible for his son, one day, to enter into a political career. For at the time, Jews, Catholics as well as dissenters were all "disabled" from serving in Parliament.

After several attempts, Disraeli was elected as a Conservative member of Parliament in 1837. His maiden address was drowned out by discordant jeers and laughter.
